SCIENTIFIC LITERATURE ON CURRENT EDUCATIONAL PROBLEMS

THE SCHOOL REVIEW

THE School Review is an open forum for the discussion of progressive movements in secondary education. It prints scientific studies in regard to the junior high school, supervised study, standards and tests, problems of organization and class instruction, etc. It presents practical material in the form of discussions of classroom methods and administrative devices. It includes a department of reviews which keeps the reader in touch with significant publications from month to month.

THE ELEMENTARY SCHOOL JOURNAL

THE Elementary School Journal emphasizes progressive movements in elementary education, publishes studies which contribute results of value to teachers, promotes the scientific study of school problems, and devotes much space to reviews of recent literature and to news notes on major movements in education.

THE SUPPLEMENTARY EDUCATIONAL MONOGRAPHS

THE Supplementary Educational Monographs present a body of scientific and practical material covering reading, arithmetic, penmanship, algebra, and the administrative organization of elementary schools and high schools. These represent a type of quantitative scientific material which is indispensable to the student of current educational problems and to the school administrator. The monographs include a series of significant historical surveys of American education.

PREFACE

Ohio's educational history has been an especially interesting one. Many causes have combined to make it so. It was the first state admitted from the Northwest Territory, and as such carried on the earliest experiments with the great state-wide grant of school lands that has characterized our policy since that time in the admission of new states to the Union. It was settled with unexampled rapidity, changing from a wilderness frontier to a great and prosperous commonwealth in a single generation. The settlement was a singularly heterogeneous one, coming from the East, the Middle States, and the South, with a considerable influx directly from Europe. These early settlements were being established, too, while those democratic and individualistic tendencies that marked the first decades of the nineteenth century were in progress. During these years the district school idea was at its height in Massachusetts and the East, the private academy was displacing the town grammar school, and state control of public education was at low ebb.

These causes, with others more local in nature, were instrumental in shaping the educational activities of the state in the first fifty years of its history and have left their imprint on all the later development.

It is my purpose to give a careful study and interpretation of the educational legislation of the state from territorial days down to 1850. In this legislation one finds the truest expression of the constructive educational thought and activity of the period.

In such a study there must be included not merely the laws that bear on the development of a state system of public education, but the much larger number that are concerned with private educational ventures of various kinds. To these must be added those laws that bear on higher and professional education, all that touch upon supplementary agencies of any kind, and also any provisions made for the indigent, defective, and delinquent classes.

A study of this kind is needed as a background before any adequate state or national history of education is possible. Such a study also gives the general student of history a view of one of the most important phases in the social development of a state, and a closer acquaintance with the growth of some of the most important institutions that society has discovered to aid it in its progress.

I have attempted in the following pages to present the material in such a way that it will be of service to the general student, and also in the appendixes to furnish a guide for anyone desiring further information from the source material on any particular phase of the state's educational activities.

The plan of arrangement is as follows: A discussion and interpretation of the laws passed from 1803 to 1850; Appendix A, a classified list of the titles of the more important acts; Appendix B, a complete index, page and volume, to all the legislation that in any way touches upon education, in the session laws of Ohio from 1803 to 1850, including both the general and the local laws.

In many cases I have not given the exact titles in the appendixes, for the sake of both brevity and clearness; enough of titles and content to indicate the general meaning of the act is given. In Appendix A a brief abstract of the laws is also included where it seemed necessary to give more information than the title itself conveys.

This is especially the case in the acts of incorporation of that large number of secondary and higher institutions that were so abundant in the first fifty years of Ohio's history. A complete tabulation of these acts is here given, and, as it is the only complete list of these institutions that has been made, it seemed best to preserve in a few words the chief points of historical interest that appear in the laws.

I felt this to be particularly the case with the secondary schools. These have nearly all passed out of existence, and, as they mark one of the most important stages in the development of our secondary education, a somewhat more complete abstract is given than that dealing with most of the other subjects.

The public-school laws are more easily accessible and they are usually indicated by title only. There was an exceptionally large amount of legislation, especially of a local and special character, dealing with the school lands. The more important of these acts are included by title in the first appendix with a mere tabulation of those that had only local significance.

The laws in Appendix A are grouped under the following headings:

- I. The public-school system.
 1. General legislation.
 - a) Acts to incorporate the original surveyed townships including provisions for districting, establishing schools, apportioning money, etc.
 - b) General school laws.
 - c) Special acts concerning public schools.
 - d) Fines, fees, etc., applied to the support of public schools.
 2. City and town school charters.
 - a) Laws concerning common schools in cities and towns.
 - b) Acts concerning local school funds.
 - c) Acts concerning schools for poor children.
- II. Laws concerning school lands.
 1. General laws concerning school lands.
 2. Special acts concerning school lands.
- III. Secondary and higher education.
 1. Acts incorporating secondary institutions.
 2. Acts incorporating school associations.
 3. Acts concerning higher institutions.
 - a) Colleges, universities, and theological seminaries.
 4. Acts concerning professional education.
 - a) Medical education.
 - b) Legal education.
- IV. Acts concerning the education of defectives, dependents, and delinquents.
 1. Education of defectives.
 2. Education of dependents.
 3. Education of delinquents.
- V. Acts concerning the education of teachers.
- VI. Acts concerning supplementary educational agencies.

Appendix B furnishes a page and volume index to all laws, resolutions, and memorials that have any educational significance in either the general or the local laws from 1803 to 1850. The indexes in the volumes of the session laws themselves are sometimes defective, and they are, too, an unreliable guide, as many important items are found in laws the titles to which give no hint that they contain material that relates in any way to education.

The primary source material has been the session laws of the state of Ohio. The Revised Statutes for this period have also been consulted.

It was found necessary to examine all the laws of the period, special and general, as the titles and indexes were not dependable. A considerable quantity of material was also found in the resolutions and memorials.

The United States Statutes at Large were used to secure federal legislation concerning school lands in Ohio. Nashee's A Compilation of Laws, Treaties and Ordinances Which Relate to Lands in the State of Ohio was relied upon especially for acts passed during the territorial period.

The earliest congressional legislation was secured from the Journals of the American Congress, reprinted by Way and Gideon, in 1823, under the title as given.

The chief secondary sources consulted are indicated in the bibliography.

GENERAL INTRODUCTION

This monograph is the second of a series on the history of the educational legislation of various states, principally in the period 1776-1850. In the first monograph, "Educational Legislation and Administration in the State of New York from 1777 to 1850," by Elsie Garland Hobson, there will be found a general introduction to this series explaining its scope and purpose. Attention is called to the fact that these monographs represent an effort to vitalize American educational history by emphasizing its institutional aspects, heretofore greatly neglected. The tendency to consider educational theory and method as the chief subject-matter of our educational history has done much harm, for no great progress can be made toward a comprehensive understanding of the evolution of American education until we have an accurate knowledge of all the laws passed by each state, affecting either public or private education. That knowledge is not now available. It may be noted also that detailed studies of this sort are of great importance to students of the general history of the United States, or the individual states, as well as to those who are especially interested in our social, religious, economic, or political history. The lack of such studies is the reason for the inadequate and inaccurate account of American education in general and special histories of the types mentioned above. The present volume is of special interest because it shows how the first frontier state formed from the Northwest Territory reacted to the problem of education and how it dealt with the difficult problem of the management of the federal land grants for the endowment of public education. The experience of Ohio had great influence on the attitude of other western states toward this problem. Professor Miller has made available information from original sources, hitherto practically inaccessible; and has given in the appendixes the data which make it possible for one to investigate in still greater detail the relation of the state of Ohio to education to 1850, so far as it is expressed in the legislation.

CHAPTER I

THE SOURCES OF OHIO'S PUBLIC-SCHOOL SYSTEM

INTRODUCTORY

Ohio was admitted into the Union as a state February 19, 1803.¹ It was the first state admitted from the Northwest Territory and the first state to which the grant of Section 16 for school purposes was made. The legislation concerning school lands was intimately connected with the development of the public-school system, and in the method to be adopted to make this great grant productive of the desired results Ohio had no precedents or warnings for her guidance.²

The constitution adopted when Ohio became a state remained in force until 1851. It made no specific provisions for education, but stated that means of education³ should be encouraged by legislative enactments; that all institutions of all grades, endowed in whole or in part from revenues derived from the donations of the United States, should be open without distinction to all scholars; and that associations of persons might receive letters of incorporation from the legislature to enable them to hold estates for the support of their schools, academies, colleges, and universities.

No provision for public schools was made by any general law during the first eighteen years after Ohio's admission, the first school law being passed in 1821.⁴ From this period until 1850 eight general school codes were enacted with numerous amendments and supplementary acts and a mass of special legislation concerning particular districts or territories.

The traditions of Ohio were from the first against centralization.⁵ The first constitution was formed soon after the bitter political struggle between Jefferson and Adams, and at a time when the arbitrary domination of the territorial governor, Arthur

St. Clair, had prejudiced the people against centralized executive power. Nowhere is this prejudice against centralized administration better illustrated than in the various phases of educational legislation. The tendency throughout the period under discussion was to depend largely upon local initiative and control. The encouragement of education by legislative provision specified in the constitution was interpreted by the legislature to mean the passing of a larger number of local acts to meet the special needs or desires of particular districts, or even, in the case of school lands, the desires of individuals, while the general laws may be said to have pointed out methods of organization and control rather than to have devised any efficient system of supervision or penalties actually to bring about specific educational results.

The general laws are largely permissive in character, with the initiative left in many cases to the discretion of the local community. There are doubtless other reasons for this than the prejudice against the acts of Arthur St. Clair and the general political state of mind in the West during the early period of Ohio's history.

Ohio in its early statehood was a frontier community, settled by a class of people that in the very nature of the case were compelled largely to be self-reliant and to solve their own problems, educational as well as other. It was a heavily timbered area. Means of communication were difficult. It would have been a hard matter to establish any general system of control or supervision in the early period, and when means of communication had become simplified, through a system of state roads and canals,¹ the people had become habituated to attending to their own educational needs.

The settlers in Ohio, too, had no common educational background. They came from New England, from Virginia, Maryland, and Kentucky, and, in fact, from nearly all the older states.²

A glance at the map on page 55 shows that the state was divided into a number of separate districts such as the Western Reserve, the Ohio Company's Purchase, the Symmes Purchase, the Virginia Military Lands, and the United States Military Lands. The early settlements in these sections were usually made up of people who came into the wilderness together from one or another of the older states of the Union.

Each of these districts, in its customs and ideals, reflected the current thought and practice of that part of the country from which its settlers came, and in no field was this more evident than in that of education. The Ohio Company's Purchase and the Western Reserve were at first largely settled by colonists from New England. Marietta, dating from 1787, and Cleveland, from 1796, were the respective centers of influence in these two districts.

Three colonies were planted in the Symmes Purchase in 1788; the one at Losantiville, later rechristened Cincinnati by Governor St. Clair, was destined to be in many ways a leader for the entire state as well as for the Miami country. The early settlers here, as at Marietta, had many of them seen service in the Revolutionary War. They came from no single locality, but New Jersey men seemed most prominent in the early settlement, aided by the other Middle States.¹ Later there were many settlers from Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, New York, and the New England states.

The Virginia Military Lands,² located between the Little Miami and the Scioto rivers, received its first settlers from Virginia and the South. General Nathaniel Massie and Duncan McArthur founded Chillicothe, on the Scioto River, in 1796, the first colony in this district.

On the eastern edge of the state, south of the Western Reserve, are the so-called Seven Ranges, the name given to the ranges of townships first surveyed in Ohio. While there was no such colonization here as in the districts already named, the first settlers were largely from Pennsylvania, and of German stock, with a considerable number of Irish, Scotch, and Scotch-Irish.

The United States Military Lands seem to have had no early homogeneous group, but drew settlers from all the older states.

There was also a considerable French settlement at Gallipolis and a sprinkling of French all along the Ohio River.

From 1830 on there was a very considerable German influence from the influx of German immigrants that began at that time.³

The population increased with astonishing rapidity after Ohio was admitted as a state, constant accessions from the older states were added to the early settlements, and in the years from 1810 to 1840 the transformation from a thickly wooded frontier to a settled farming community had largely taken place. The census figures from 1800 to 1850 give some idea of this transformation. At the beginning of the century the population was 45,365; fifty years later it had increased to 1,980,329. The record of increase by decades which follows gives an even better picture of the sudden changes that must have occurred:

1800.....	45,365
1810.....	230,760
1820.....	580,434
1830.....	937,903
1840.....	1,519,467
1850.....	1,980,329 ¹

The census figures for the last decade of this period show a foreign-born population of 218,193. In 1850 there were almost as many people of foreign birth in the state as its entire population had amounted to only forty years earlier in 1810. These people of foreign birth were largely of German stock.

It was no easy problem to develop a system of education to meet the needs of this surprising growth, coming as it did from all the older states and from foreign shores.

There was in these early years no agreement as to the means of financing any general system of education, nor any real agreement as to the needs of such a system. The educational traditions were quite different in different portions of the state. Samuel Lewis in his second annual report in 1838 says: "The people have not heretofore followed any particular system. The directors of each district have done that which was right in their own eyes, and generally adopted, as far as they could, the particular system of the state from whence they came."² Those from the South brought traditions of the private school and parental responsibility for education. The New England settlers brought with them the idea of a public-school system, with taxation and public control, but unfortunately for Ohio's subsequent educational history the New England migration came at a period when the public-school sentiment in Massachusetts and the East was at a comparatively low ebb, and when the decentralizing tendency that gave Massachusetts the district-school legislation of 1789 was at its time of greatest influence.

² Ohio Documents, 1838, Doc. 32, p. 30.

From this time for nearly forty years the process of decentralization went on. Martin says the year 1827 is "the high-water mark of modern democracy and the low-water mark of the Massachusetts school system."¹ The New England influence in Ohio began with the Marietta colony in 1787. By 1830 the population of the state had reached nearly a million, and it was during just these years that the school sentiment in Massachusetts was lowest.

It was at this time, too, that the academy was supplanting the Latin grammar school of the colonial period as the typical secondary school.

The New England settlers favored the public-school idea, but it was the highly decentralized district system with which they were familiar. The academy idea was the common possession of settlers from all the states.

The common school as a district school, the secondary school as an academy, were two fundamental conceptions in the minds of all those who were active in securing Ohio's early school legislation. While many influences were thus instrumental in shaping Ohio's early educational history, her debt to New England for the men and ideas most significant in determining her early public-school system is so large that a brief sketch of a few of these men and of the forces that worked through them is a necessary prerequisite to an intelligent study of the development of that system.

The most important of these forces were, first, the school lands;² secondly, the conception of a state system of schools; and, thirdly, the idea of state-wide taxation for the benefit of such a system.

The use of public lands for the aid and support of schools had its origin in New England. The men most instrumental in urging Ohio's first law, giving a legal basis to the conception of a state system of schools, were born in New England. The men most active in legalizing the idea of state-wide taxation to support this system were also New England born, and the man who did most to make these ideas, incorporated into law, actually operative in the establishment of schools and to give a real organization to the system legally created was a man of New England birth.

When Ohio was admitted as a state, Section 16 in each township, or an equivalent amount of land in those districts not belonging to the United States, was permanently set aside for the use of schools.

This grant gave for the use of schools an amount of land equal to one square mile, or 640 acres, for each surveyed township of 36 square miles.

The practice of using public lands for the support of schools had been from early colonial times a common New England device, and by 1647 certain towns had "assumed responsibility for the support of schools out of public property, partly through gifts of land to schoolmasters, partly by setting aside tracts of land as a permanent endowment."¹

This New England practice first found state-wide expression when Ohio was admitted to the Union, and from that time on became an established policy in the admission of all later states. The Ordinance of 1785 "for ascertaining the mode of disposing of lands in the Western territory"² reserved Section 16 in each township "for the maintenance of public schools within the said township." This provision, according to Donaldson,³ was the inception of the rule of the reservation of certain sections of land for school purposes. The first action in accord with this provision occurred within the next two years, when Manasseh Cutler, as agent for the Ohio Company, completed the bargain for the lands acquired by the company at the mouth of the Muskingum.⁴ Not only did Mr. Cutler obtain a reaffirmation of the provision for the grant of Section 16 for school purposes, but a grant of Section 29 in each township for the support of religion, and also an added grant of two townships for the support of a university. It was this bargain of the Ohio Company, engineered by Manasseh Cutler, that put into actual operation the provisions of the Ordinance of 1785 concerning school lands. This was followed immediately by the Symmes Purchase, between the Miami rivers, and Sections 16 and 29 were similarly reserved.

With the admission of Ohio as a state the same provision for schools, Section 16 or its equivalent for each township, was extended to the remainder of the state except the portion still held by the Indian tribes. Ultimately the reservation was extended to all territory within the state.

In this state-wide grant was found an interest that directed the attention of settlers in all parts of the state, and from all parts of the United States, to the purpose for which the grants were made, the schools. The first legislation concerning schools is found in efforts made to work out a method of handling the school lands, and they remain during Ohio's early statehood one of the persistent incentives to educational legislation and a constant suggestion of a state school system.

The first general school act for Ohio was passed January 22, 1821.¹ It is a significant fact that the four men most instrumental in putting on the statute books of Ohio laws providing for a tax-supported system of common schools were all born in Massachusetts. These men were Ephraim Cutler, Caleb Atwater, Nathan Guilford, and Samuel Lewis.

Ephraim Cutler, of Ames, Washington County, near Marietta, was the son of Manasseh Cutler, the inspired lobbyist of the Ohio Company. He was born in Edgartown, Massachusetts, but spent his boyhood in Killingly, Connecticut, with his grandparents and came to Ohio in his early manhood. He was one of the drafters of the state constitution, and it was due to his efforts that there were incorporated the clauses providing that "religion, morality and knowledge, as essentially necessary to good government," were to be supported by the General Assembly and "that schools and the means of instruction shall forever be encouraged by legislative provision."²

Judge Cutler in December, 1819, introduced a bill in the House of Representatives providing for a system of common schools. The bill as introduced was passed by the House, but was allowed to die without action in the Senate. It was this bill, however, that led to the law of 1821, a substitute measure that did little more than outline a method of school organization and in so doing recognized the state's responsibility of legislating for schools.

Caleb Atwater was born in North Adams, Massachusetts.³ He was appointed one of a committee of seven, in December, 1821, to consider the subject of schools and school lands and report to the House of Representatives. As a result of the deliberations of this committee a commission of five was appointed, January, 1822, to report to the next General Assembly on a system of common schools.

This commission collected much valuable material, which was presented to the Assembly in 1823, but the friends of education were in a minority, and no legislative action was taken during that session. One of the members of this commission was Nathan Guilford, a book-dealer and publisher of Cincinnati, the editor of The Freeman's Almanack, a western counterpart of Poor Richard, popularly known as Solomon Thrifty's Almanack.

Mr. Guilford was born in Spencer, Massachusetts,¹ and was educated at Yale. He was a constant advocate of popular education and of taxation for schools in Ohio.

Samuel Lewis, Ohio's first and greatest state superintendent of schools, was born in Falmouth, Massachusetts,² but came to Ohio as a boy. He was the author of, and prime mover for, the school law of 1838, which gave to Ohio its first completely organized school system.

The act of 1821 had done little more than legalize means by which the settlers in the townships could move to lay off districts and establish schools. It made no provision for taxation and organized no definite system. It was, however, important as the first state recognition of a system of common schools. It was evident to friends of public education that the law of 1821 was inadequate and ineffective, and there began at once a campaign for a more effective law.

Nathan Guilford used the sayings of Solomon Thrifty to arouse the people of the state to the need of a free common school education. In 1824 he says: "The Legislatures of Ohio and Kentucky have taken the subject of free schools into consideration. It is hoped that their zealous endeavors to establish a system of common education will be crowned with success. Millions unborn would rise and bless them."³

Caleb Atwater and his committee, after careful study and much correspondence, had recommended a commission of seven to report on the subject of the school lands and a school system. This commission⁴ consisted of Caleb Atwater, Rev. John Collins, Rev. James Hoge, Nathan Guilford, Ephraim Cutler, Josiah Barber, and

James Bell. The number corresponded with the total number of different grants of school lands, and each man was to study and report upon the condition of the lands in the territory assigned him. Caleb Atwater was assigned the Congress Lands; John Collins, the Virginia Military Lands; James Hoge, the Refugee Lands; James Bell, the United States Military Lands; Ephraim Cutler, the Ohio Company Lands; Nathan Guilford, the Symmes Purchase Lands; and Josiah Barber, the Connecticut Western Reserve Lands.

It was evidently the original opinion of many of the settlers in Ohio, and perhaps the design of Congress, that these land grants, if properly managed, would support public schools without a tax upon the citizens. There was a growing belief, however, that this one source of income would continue to prove inadequate. Nathan Guilford, who strongly advocated taxation, did not serve upon the commission, evidently believing that he could aid the cause of education better as a free lance. He addressed a public letter to the chairman of the board arguing for a school tax upon property and insisting that an adequate school fund could not be raised from the school lands alone.

The commission had been directed to report upon three topics: the actual condition of the school lands; a bill proposing a system of school law; a report on the necessity and value of the system proposed. Pamphlets were issued on these topics and widely circulated, and they served to awaken an interest throughout the state in public education.

The system proposed was modeled on the New York state system.¹ It provided for an economical management of the school lands, but made no provision for taxation. The legislature of 1823 was, however, opposed to any liberal action for public education. Atwater says: "In this legislature were many influential men who were opposed to a school system, to a sale of school lands and to internal improvements. . . . This session had a majority of both houses opposed to a school system and the sale of school lands, and all that was done by them was to quarrel about these subjects. They finally broke up in a row and went home."²

In the campaign for the state election of 1824 the subjects of internal improvements, the public-school system, and the taxation system of the state were the main issues before the people. A majority favorable to the public schools and internal improvements was chosen, among them Nathan Guilford, elected to represent Cincinnati. When the legislature assembled, Governor Morrow presented the necessity for adequate legislation on all these questions. His message recognizes the difficulty of bringing people of divergent educational views, with no common educational inheritance, to united action for public schools. In discussing the subject he says:¹ "In this state there are causes, extensive in their nature, for difference of opinion on the subject. The population is composed principally of emigrants from the different States of the Union, with habits and modes of thinking on the subject, as different as are the regulations of the States from whence they came. . . . The act of the 22nd of January, 1821," he declares, is ineffective because the establishment of schools and school districts was made optional for the voters in each township. "Was this act made positive, and in some respects modified, we should have a system in force—perhaps not perfect—for the regulation of common schools, which could be further improved, as experience under it should point out its defects." A joint committee² was at once appointed in the General Assembly to study the subject and report an adequate bill. Mr. Guilford was made chairman of this committee and drafted the report and bill, which finally passed both houses without amendment and became the law of 1825. There was a widespread feeling in the state against imposing a tax for general school purposes, but Mr. Guilford and Mr. Cutler stood firm for this measure, and, with the assistance of the supporters of the public-school idea, insured its passage by forming an active coalition with those legislators who were working in the interests of internal improvements, especially the advocates of state canals. In this work Mr. Guilford showed himself a skilled lobbyist and shrewd judge of men in his personal campaign among the members of both houses.³

While the vote was proceeding in the house Mr. Cutler stood beside Mr. Guilford as they anxiously awaited the outcome, and when the result was announced, and it was assured that taxation for education had prevailed, he turned to his companion and exclaimed: "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." The great initial victory for public education had been won, and had been won primarily by New England ideas backed up by New England men.

It remained to give these ideas and this system effective organization. This was not accomplished until thirteen years later, in 1838, under the leadership of Samuel Lewis, when a wholly new school code was adopted. Following the act of 1825 there were numerous modifications and amendments of the law, but no essential change in the system of administration was made until 1838.

The law of 1825 had made no provision for centralized control, and had created no adequate machinery for uniting the various schools and districts established into a true state system. There was no state, county, or township supervision, and but little actual knowledge, and no control, of what various communities were doing educationally. While the law had established the fundamental principle of taxation for schools, the actual system remained a headless, disjointed, decentralized, and ineffective one.

The first suggestions for reform came from the friends of education in Cincinnati. A group of teachers and other earnest advocates of popular education had organized a voluntary association known as the College of Teachers or Western Academic Institute.¹ This body met annually for the discussion and study of educational topics and attracted to its meetings, not only Ohio teachers, but educational leaders from the other western states as well. Partly as a result of a demand for a better organization created through the discussions of this association,² a bill was introduced in 1837 to create the office of state superintendent of common schools. It met with determined opposition, but finally passed the House by a vote of 35 to 34, and became a law in March, of the same year, with a decisive vote in its favor in the Senate.

Samuel Lewis, of Cincinnati, was the first and only incumbent of the office, which he held for three years. The law of 1838 was a direct result of the work of his first year and of his study of the needs and conditions of schools as he saw them while touring the state visiting the schools and addressing meetings in an attempt to arouse people to an active interest in the need of better school conditions. In this work he visited more than three hundred schools, traveling on horse-back over twelve hundred miles over the rough country roads, visiting schools by day, addressing public meetings by night, and everywhere preaching the gospel of a better school system and a free education for every Ohio boy and girl. He always found it hard, and often discouraging work. He writes from Cleveland in November, 1837:

I arrived here today almost worn down; have rode on an average twenty-six miles a day this week. I generally spend three or four hours a day in conversation, answering questions, giving explanations, and making suggestions. It is harder than it would be to deliver an address every day an hour and a half long. . . . I fear you overvalue my efforts. . . . I shall, however, do my best. I leave here on Monday, if health permit, and shall get along as fast as I can to Columbus, visiting on my route, as I suppose, about sixteen counties. . . . The task before me is so great, that with all my time and close attention, I shall hardly be able to get through.

In a later letter he writes:

On Saturday last, I delivered an address at Canton, and after riding twenty-six miles on Monday, spoke in the evening to a large audience, and I believe I did good. . . . I work hard day and night, and I find it a kind of up-hill business. If men would only do something, even in opposition, it would be better than it is. Almost every man agrees with me; thousands listen and applaud; and even candid men of sense declare they have never heard this subject treated with so much interest, and then leave it to go alone, or get on unaided by their efforts. Still I am not discouraged, but am determined to work on till my report is in, hoping at least for the final triumph of sound principles and practice.¹

His report for the year 1837, based on his own observation and such statistics as he could gather from the county auditors, gave the first assembled information about the common schools of the state. The report found the legislature in a receptive mood, and the law of 1838 was passed with but little opposition. The essential feature of the new law, in comparison with those that had preceded, consisted in the fact that it gave organization and headship to the system.

The new code retained the state superintendent at the head of the schools; the act of 1837 had created the office, but had done nothing to change the rest of the law or the machinery of administration. In each county the new law made the county auditor also the county superintendent of schools, and, as such, responsible to the state superintendent in all educational affairs. Similarly in each township the township clerk was made the township superintendent of schools, subordinate to the county superintendent.

An organization had been established by means of which an authorized state officer could reach out into the most remote district of the state, either to give help or information or to see that the law was obeyed. If equipped with the proper men, Ohio, through this law, had the mechanism for effective educational administration.

The real strength of the system rested in the office of state superintendent. Mr. Lewis filled the office for three years, and in those three years did the same kind of work for Ohio that Horace Mann was doing for Massachusetts. Unfortunately for Ohio and her subsequent educational history, Mr. Lewis, because of failing health, gave up the office after three years of tireless service, and the legislature, because some opposition had developed, transferred the work to the office of the secretary of state. This office was given four hundred dollars additional for clerk hire, and the work became the collection of statistics and making of reports, not the administration of a state-wide school system.

We have seen that the old New England idea of using lands for schools first found application in Ohio, and that New England men were chiefly instrumental in giving to the state the first law of 1821, the principle of taxation in 1825, and the organized system of 1838. We may now turn to a more detailed study of the laws themselves.

Before doing this, however, we must say a few words about the schools from 1803 to 1821, the date of the first school law. The general type of common schools during this period was the pay or subscription school.¹ The following agreements and advertisements give a picture of the practice, such that any added explanation is unnecessary.

An advertisement in the Western Spy, October 22, 1799, reads as follows:

NOTICE.—The public in general and my former subscribers in particular, are respectfully informed that I expect to commence school again on the 1st day of January, 1805. I shall teach reading, writing, arithmetic and English grammar, indiscriminately, for two dollars per quarter. The strictest care will be given to the school, as my circumstances will then admit of my constant presence with the school. Those who place confidence in my abilities and fidelity may be assured that both will be employed to please the parents who shall commit, and benefit the children who shall be committed to my care.

CHAPTER II

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE PUBLIC-SCHOOL SYSTEM

THE PUBLIC-SCHOOL SYSTEM, 1803-50

The general educational legislation of this period is concerned only with the district school. There was no general legislative enactment to establish secondary or higher institutions of learning as a part of the state system of education, and it was not until 1847 that there was any legislation to make provision for town and city schools and a graded system, other than that found in special town and city charters.

The chief legislative enactments that divide this period and mark especially important phases in the growth of the system of public schools are as follows:

1821¹—The first school law. Recognition of state need and responsibility.

1825²—The second school law. The first tax for schools.

1838³—A state system organized. A definite school fund guaranteed and the schools,⁴ in theory, made free.

1847-48⁵—The Akron Act passed. A system for town and city schools established.

These dates mark off periods that may be roughly characterized as follows:

1803-21—Subscription or pay schools.

1821-25—State recognition of the public-school idea.

1825-38—Property taxation to aid schools.

1838-50—Operation under a loose state organization.

1847-50—The development of town and city school systems.

Numerous school laws were passed from 1825 to 1838, but the changes were minor in character and developed no new principles.

A clearer view of the growth of the public-school system can be gained if the more important phases of that development are treated separately, showing the various stages that each of these phases passed through during the entire period.

THE ORGANIZATION OF THE SCHOOL SYSTEM, 1803-50

It may be said that the school system of the state had its beginning in the grant of one section in each township for the use of schools that Ohio received from the United States when she became a state.¹ This grant, wasted as it afterward was, served as one center of common educational interest and brought the topic of common schools constantly before legislators and people.

The unit of organization during the entire period was the district. The earliest legislation bearing in any way upon the organization of schools is found in an act of January 2, 1806,² establishing the method of incorporating townships.

This act provides:

That so soon as there are twenty qualified electors in any original surveyed township of six miles square, or fractional township within the state wherein there is the reserved section number 16, granted by the Congress of the United States for the special use of schools; they are hereby authorized under the provision hereafter provided, to elect three trustees and one treasurer for the purpose of taking into their care the section above mentioned, who shall be a body politic, capable of suing and being sued, pleading and being impleaded.

This early legislation precedes any specific school act, and is found in the laws concerning the organization of the township. It is the undoubted result of the grant of school lands and is an indication of the importance of this grant in keeping before the people the ideal of state-wide education.

All parts of the state had land set aside for school use. This was the one common fact in all attempts to meet local educational needs. On this subject there had to be legislation general in nature. It was the one subject of common educational interest. This earlier legislation was concerned primarily in determining how the scant funds from this source might be legally used, either to support for short periods schools that depended solely on this source of income, or to supplement and assist private and subscription schools of various kinds.

¹ A description of this grant and the use made of it will be found in the discussion of the school lands in chapter iii.

The trustees chosen in compliance with this legislation of 1806 were given authority to divide the township into districts for the purpose of establishing schools, but were not directed to do so. They were, however, directed to divide the profits¹ arising from the school lands, among the districts that were established, in proportion to the inhabitants. In passing this act the legislature was evidently primarily interested in the management of Section 16, not in the establishment of schools. Those townships that wished to do it were given the right to organize districts and use the funds obtained from the school lands to support their schools. It is evident from subsequent legislation,² and from the reports of Superintendent Lewis,³ that these funds were also used to pay or lessen the expense of subscription schools already under way in the community. In all laws touching on this subject, following the act of 1806, the township trustees are the officers charged with the duty of dividing the township into school districts, but the final decision as to whether such divisions are to be made does not legally rest with them, although in practice it is evident that it often did so.

In 1814,⁴ in an act supplementary to the foregoing, it was made obligatory upon the trustees to lay the township off in districts upon the application of six householders of the township, but no penalties were imposed for a failure to do so. This same act directed that those establishing a school in a district should choose three (school) trustees, whose sole duties seemed to be to get from the teacher a certified list of the pupils who had attended the schools, and the length of time they had been taught, and present it to the township trustees as a basis for the distribution of the revenue from the school section.

¹ Legal provision had been made as early as 1803, the year Ohio was admitted, for renting the school lands. See chapter iii for a discussion of the legislation concerning the treatment of these lands.

³ Ohio Documents, 36th G.A., Doc. 17, pp. 9, 10.

⁴ O.L., XIII, 295.

On January 22, 1821,¹ Ohio's first general school act was passed. By its provisions the method of organizing districts legalized in 1814 is evidently repealed though it is not so specified. The specific provisions of the act that concern organization are that the voters in each township should have the right to vote upon the question of districting the township. In case the vote was in favor of such districting, the trustees were directed to lay off the school districts in such a way as to have not less than twelve nor more than forty householders in one district. They were also directed in their districting to have regard to any school companies incorporated, so as to include the members within one district.

The householders in each district were to elect annually a school committee of three and a collector. The duty of the latter was evidently to collect rates for the support of the school from those who sent children to it, the tax for building a schoolhouse in case such a tax was levied, and any amount levied as necessary for paying the rates for the indigent children of the district. This law also required the directors to appoint a district clerk, whose duties were to keep a record of the meetings, make out the tax bills when a tax was levied, and keep such accounts as the school committee might direct.

The legislation up to this point has been chiefly concerned in providing an organization for two purposes: a fair and legal method for distributing the revenues that arose from the school lands, and a method by which local communities could legally lay out their districts and set up schools. There was nothing in this earliest legislation that in any way approached a state system or compelled any state-wide action concerning education.

It was the evident intention of the next general law, passed in 1825,² to establish a system that should be state-wide in its operation. Its great advance over preceding laws was, however, in its use of the principle of state-wide taxation rather than any significant change in the organization of schools. The establishment of districts and schools remained a local and decentralized activity, and no true state system was formed.

It was made the duty of the township trustees to lay off each incorporated township in the state into one or more school districts. Certain negative penalties were imposed in this law upon townships that were not divided into districts and upon districts that did not employ teachers, but any real compelling force that such a provision might have had was destroyed by the excessive liberality of the time limitation allowed for meeting the minimum requirements of the law.

No township was entitled to receive any portion of the moneys collected for school purposes, either from the school lands or from taxation, unless it was laid off into districts. (It might be laid off in one district six miles square and meet the legal requirement.) Furthermore, if it were not laid off into districts within five years, the money due it arising from the school tax was apportioned to the other townships of the county which had been so laid off. Similarly, any district which for a period of three years failed to hire a teacher and keep a school was penalized by having the money due it apportioned to the districts that obeyed the law.

This did not refer to the money from Section 16. By the terms of the original grant, this was set aside for the use of the schools of the township, and the funds from it could not be alienated to the use of another township.

The law of 1825 provided for a school tax, and the penalty for not districting the township consisted¹ in losing after a five-year period the township share in this tax. No provision was made other than this for the enforcement of the law. There were no penalties for the township trustees, and no officers whose duty it was to see that the law was carried into effect. It was the evident idea of the legislators that the incentive afforded by a share in the school tax would be sufficient to bring about the erection of school districts in all the townships of the state. That this was not the universal result is shown by the fact that throughout the period, even as late as 1849,² there reappear in general laws and in amendatory and supplementary acts constant directions to the township trustees to lay off the township into school districts. The later directions probably usually refer to the organization of new counties and townships in the more unsettled portions of the state. In general, the townships seem to have followed the mandates of the law and availed themselves of the opportunity to share in the money raised by the tax.

Mr. Lewis in his first report as state superintendent, in 1837,¹ showed that there were 7,748 organized school districts in the state. There were 1,129 townships in 71 of the 75 counties of the state, which would give an average of nearly seven school districts to the township, an indication that the law was quite generally obeyed. There was, however, no uniformity in the amount of territory included in the districts (an entire township might be organized as one district), and, as Mr. Lewis pointed out, the number in each township did vary from one or two to eighteen. The district lines were "frequently made on personal considerations, or to defeat some contemplated improvement. It is not uncommon to find districts so bounded as to exclude whole tracts of land from the operation of the law."² The report further indicates that there were individual townships even in the older counties that had not organized school districts at the date of the report, 1837, "and many more in the new counties that have just commenced operations."

The organization within the district was effected by the district meeting choosing three directors, who were to have direct control and management of the schools.

It should be kept clearly in mind in this and subsequent legislation that the directors are officers of the district, the trustees are officers of the township.

The only compulsory feature in the district organization was a fine of two dollars, which was provided for by an amendment in 1830,³ imposed upon any person who was elected school director or treasurer and refused to serve. This provision was repeated in the general laws of 1832⁴ and 1834.⁵

These amendments were evidently caused by frequent refusal to serve by those elected to the school offices in the local districts. That the work was a real burden and rested upon a small army of local school officers may be seen in another quotation from the state superintendent's first report:

There is no feature in the present law more burdensome than that of requiring so many officers to spend several days in every year in doing what would be better done by one-fifth the number. . . . The amount of time now required, if the officers do their duty, will, if computed at the average price of day labor, amount to a heavier tax than is assessed in money for the support of schools. . . . There are now 38,740 officers, enough certainly to break down any system however otherwise good.¹

To summarize: On the side of local organization, the law of 1825 directed the township trustees throughout the state to lay off the townships into school districts, in which the electors might organize by choosing directors, the only compulsion for either township or district coming from a loss in the share of the school tax.

County contact with the township and district was first established in the law of 1825,² by which the county officials were made responsible for the collection and distribution of the school tax,³ and through the appointment of a board of examiners by the Court of Common Pleas. This county relationship was concerned only with the distribution of school funds and the examination⁴ of teachers, and had in it no direct element of control or supervision. The certification of teachers by a county authority, rather than a local authority, did, of course, introduce one element of control.

The next step in the direction of county organization was taken in the law of 1836,⁵ which provided that the county auditor should open an account directly with each school district in the county, and made the further provision that each district school clerk should report annually to the county auditor. The county auditor became the intermediary officer in gathering information for the use of the state as to the general school conditions. It is evident that the legislature felt the need of information regarding school conditions throughout the state as a basis for legislative action. The directions are specific as to the information wanted and include the following items: the enumeration of white children from four to twenty-one years old in the district; the time the school had been kept in the district; the time the school had been supported by the school fund; the time the school had been supported by taxation; the time the school had been supported by voluntary subscription; the amount of money from each source; the number of children that had been taught; the whole amount spent for teachers' wages; the amount paid for schoolhouses and repairs, giving as separate items the sum raised by taxation for this purpose and that raised by voluntary subscription.

Each county auditor was directed to make an abstract¹ of the information so gathered for his county, and to report the same annually to the General Assembly.

It will be seen that the law up to this point connected the state, county, and district in a loose organization through a system of reports and through certain financial contacts in the collection and distribution of the school tax.

The system lacked a supervising head with definite responsibility for following up the directions given by the law and for seeing that the information asked for was actually gathered and used. The legislature evidently realized this, and the following year,² 1837, passed a law creating the office of superintendent of common schools, with an annual salary of five hundred dollars.

The chief duties of the office so created were to collect and tabulate statistics, to investigate the conditions of the various school funds resulting from the sale of lands, and, in general, to study the school needs of the state and suggest plans for better regulation and control of educational affairs to the General Assembly. Samuel Lewis, of Cincinnati, was appointed to the office April 1, 1837.³ Following his recommendations, the legislature enacted in 1838⁴ an act for the support and better regulation of common schools and to create permanently the office of superintendent of common schools. Mr. Lewis had recommended legislation the preceding year, which had included:

school libraries; a state school fund of two hundred thousand dollars; township high schools; township Boards of Education; evening schools in towns and cities; county superintendents; a school journal to be distributed to school officers gratuitously; encouragement for the formation of Teachers' Institutes; authority for districts to borrow money to erect school-houses; the employment of women as teachers; and full reports from teachers and school officers.¹

The resulting legislation was the most important and complete act bearing upon public education passed in Ohio from 1803 to 1850, and was the last school code passed during the period. Much of its effectiveness was destroyed by subsequent amendments that will be indicated, but the act in itself attempted to establish an organized system of common schools for the state, with state, county, township, and district officers. The state superintendent stood at the head of the system. In each county the county auditor was made superintendent of common schools for the county, and in each township the township clerk was made superintendent of common schools for the township. The district meeting elected three directors, as in the case of the preceding laws. The district clerk was directed to make an annual report to the district meeting and to file a copy of his report with the township clerk. This report was to contain full financial and educational statistics of the district for the year. The duties of the township clerk, acting as superintendent, were as follows: to take an enumeration of the youth of school age in each district of the township (for failure to do this a fine of $15 was imposed upon him); to fill vacancies that occurred in any board of directors in his township; to appoint directors in case the district meeting failed to elect them, or in case the directors failed to serve, and, if those who were appointed refused to serve, to perform the duties of the directors himself for the district in question. He was directed further to report annually to the county superintendent an abstract of the reports made by the district clerks, and it was made his duty to visit each common school in the township at least once a year to examine the teacher's record and the discipline and mode of instruction and to keep a journal of his observations. He was also directed by the law to estimate each year the additional amount necessary to be raised in the district to maintain six months' school for all children.

The chief duties of the auditor as county superintendent of schools consisted in transmitting an abstract of the reports from each township to the state superintendent, and in distributing blanks, circulars, and other information from the state superintendent to the proper township and district officers.

It will be seen that in its working the system was nominal rather than actual, so far as any control of the local unit, the district, was concerned. It was designed chiefly to afford convenience for the collection of data needed by the state superintendent, and the dissemination of information from the state superintendent's office. It did provide for district officers, and even the possible establishment of schools, where the district failed to act, by giving the township clerk power to exercise the authority of the directors, and it also made some pretense at supervision through the same officers. Aside from this, it was a loose and inefficient system, depending for its value upon the energy and ability of the state superintendent in arousing educational sentiment throughout the state and upon the thoroughness with which the township clerk performed the duties laid upon him. There was still no actual compulsion in the law.

The strong points of the system consisted in the definite relationship established through state, county, township, and district officers, and the possibility of dissemination and collection of educational information through these channels. Its real effectiveness depended upon the wise leadership of the state superintendent. The law pointed out the way to a school system, and the superintendent, as an authorized educational agent, could do much to arouse state-wide interest in the schools. In his Third Annual Report, in 1839, Mr. Lewis speaks of the law in the following words:

This law, though not perfect, was the best that could be passed; and with all its imperfections, I still think it is better adapted to our wants than any other school law that has come under my notice. It gives to the people the power to do their own business, whether in townships or districts, as the majority may think best. The widest possible latitude is given for popular action. The most that the law does is to prescribe certain general rules within which the people can act under the sanction of the law, and it gives to such popular action the aid of law to effect its purpose. An arbitrary law imposing duties binding upon the people without their assent could prescribe the forms and details of the work in a few words and with great simplicity. Such would do for despotic countries, but in a free country where the actors are a people whose action depends upon their own wills, there must be a wide scope given, allowing each district to accommodate its own peculiar views, requiring it only to keep within the general outlines (and they must be only outlines) laid down by the law.¹

The effectiveness of the organization was destroyed by action of the legislature March 23, 1840,² when the office of state superintendent was abolished and the work of tabulating and transmitting school statistics and other educational information was transferred to the office of the secretary of state.

The one other point at which the law had promise of effectiveness was in the creation of the township and county superintendents. The weakness, of course, was in attaching these offices as mere appendages to the duties of the county auditor and the township clerk.

The supervisory duties of the township clerk were made dependent upon the decision of the township trustees in 1839,¹ and the amount of pay for the supervision of any one school was limited to a maximum of one dollar for any one year. This made actual supervision practically impossible. The results of these two acts were to leave the system without effective leadership and largely to destroy any possibility of controlling the school work of the district through supervision. There were portions of the state where the organization was felt to be ineffective. Samuel Lewis had advocated county supervision, and the appointment of the county auditor to this position was felt by many not to meet educational needs. Voluntary associations of teachers² discussed the question of school organization in their conventions. In 1846 Henry D. Barnard, of Connecticut, came to Ohio and lectured in numerous towns and cities,³ urging the cause of free public schools.

As one result of these discussions numerous petitions were circulated in the northern and central portions of the state, asking for a law that would give county supervision. In 1847⁴ the legislature passed a weak permissive act applicable to twenty-five counties located largely in the Western Reserve and in the central portion of the state near Columbus. This act shows clearly the general legislative willingness to legalize educational procedure and the unwillingness to adopt means to enforce the measures given the sanction of law.

The twenty-five counties in question were allowed to have county superintendents. The initiative was left in the hands of the county commissioners, who were authorized to set aside such sum as they deemed proper for the payment of a county superintendent. They were allowed to levy a tax for the purpose if they wished to do so. If a sum were set aside for the support of this office, the county superintendent was elected by the district clerks of the county. He became chairman of the county Board of Examiners, and was directed to visit annually each common school in the county as a supervising officer.

The provisions of this act were made applicable to all counties in the state the next year, 1848.¹ The act remained virtually a dead letter in the original twenty-five counties as well as in the rest of the state. It simply pointed out a way in which a county might legally appoint a county superintendent of schools if it really wished to do so, and it left the initiative in the hands of the county commissioners, who were likely to be guided in action by financial considerations more than by educational needs.²

The legislature in 1850³ passed another act that created again the office of state superintendent, but in a quite different form. This law was not permissive in form, but never actually came into operation since the General Assembly, which was the appointing body, allowed it to lapse through its failure to appoint the officers provided for in the law. In brief, this law provided for a state board of public instruction to consist of five members, appointed by the General Assembly. The first members were to be appointed for one, two, three, four, and five years. After that one member was to be appointed each year. Each member, during the last year of his term, was styled the state superintendent of common schools and carried on the duties of that office. These duties were largely limited to the collection of statistics and the reporting of the results to the General Assembly. The state was to be divided into four districts by the board, and each of the other members was to serve as a district superintendent. In this service they co-operated with the county examiners, and their signatures were necessary to give validity to teachers' certificates. The state superintendent was to prepare questions for all teachers' examinations. Teachers were required to pay one dollar on the receipt of certificates. The payment of this dollar entitled each teacher to receive a state educational paper and to attend teachers' institutes.

³ O.L., XLVIII, 44.

All fees and subscriptions to the school paper were to be paid to the state treasurer, and out of the fund so created the salaries of the state board were to be paid. The salaries were one thousand dollars for each district superintendent, and twelve hundred dollars for the state superintendent. The law specifically provided that no money from any other source should be used in the payment of these salaries. This law represented the efforts of the teachers' associations and the friends of education throughout the state. They were successful in getting the law upon the statute books by placing the responsibility for financing it upon the teachers themselves. The law, however, as has been said, was never put in active operation.

Summary.—The district was the unit of school organization throughout this period. A state organization was formed in 1838 with county and township officers. The effectiveness of the county and township organizations was largely nullified by the fact that the duties of the school officials were attached to offices primarily created for other purposes. The greatest possibility of usefulness in the system rested in the state superintendent, and this office, after a three years' trial, was abolished, and its duties transferred to the office of the secretary of state, where it became largely a clerical function.

METHODS OF COMMON-SCHOOL SUPPORT

The subject of the support of common schools during this period is an involved one as there are many sources of revenue and frequent changes in legislation. These sources may be classified as follows: school rates paid by parents; the revenue from school lands; permanent funds; revenue from the United States surplus; a guaranteed state school fund; state taxation for school support; county taxation for school support; optional township taxation for school support; district taxation for school support; revenue from fines, penalties, and fees of various kinds; district taxation for school buildings; voluntary contributions for school buildings; contributions and bequests.

Rates paid by parents.—It has already been said that the earliest schools in Ohio were subscription or pay schools. The responsibility for the education of the child during the first twenty-two years of statehood rested on the parents, not upon society or the state, except as the money received from Section 16 might assist in maintaining the local school. The principle of school rates for at least a portion of the expense was recognized in the laws of 1821,¹ 1829,² 1831,³ 1834,⁴ and 1836.⁵ In the three acts last cited it was provided that the parents should pay any additional amount needed, unless it were raised by voluntary subscription. Provision was also made for the exemption of indigent students. School rates, as a source of revenue, were not specifically recognized in the code of 1838,⁶ but reappeared the following year in an amendment,⁷ and remained until 1850 as a legal source of support.

The practical working of the law and its amendments is well shown by another quotation from Mr. Lewis' first report:

As it will be impossible to give a full history of my observations, an example of the several classes must suffice. In one town a free school is taught three months in the year, by one teacher, in a district where more than one hundred children desire to attend; they rush in and crowd the school so as to destroy all hope of usefulness, the wealthy and those in comfortable circumstances, seeing this, withdraw their children or never send them; the school thus receives the name of a school for the poor, and its usefulness is destroyed. This example is one that represents nearly all the free schools in the State, as well in the country as in the cities and towns.

Another and much larger number of the districts, adopt a practice of which the following is an example: The district has funds which would pay a teacher one quarter or less, but in order to keep up a school as long as possible, it is divided between two or more quarters; the teacher makes his estimate of the amount, besides public money, that must be paid by each scholar and gets his subscription accordingly. Here none send but those who can pay the balance; of course the children of the poor, the very intemperate and careless, with sometimes the inordinate lovers of money are left at home.

This mode though it defeats the primary object of the law, really secures a greater aggregate amount of instruction than the other. Another class proceeds on the same plan, with the exception that the teacher is bound to take the very poor free, if they prove their total inability to pay. This is but little, if any, better than the last, since the poor woman must humble herself, and in effect take the benefit of the poor law, before she can get her children into school. . . .

Another part of this class is, where the directors agree with the teacher at so much per month, and, after expending the school money, levy, under the statute, a tax on the scholars for the residue, sometimes admitting the poor, and sometimes rejecting all that are unable to pay the difference.

In some towns all the teachers receive a portion of the public money at the rate of so much per scholar, which they deduct from the subscription price. In these cases the schools are all strictly private, and no provision whatever is made for the poor. The officers in one place where this practice prevails, said that "if the schools were free, they would be so crowded as to be useless, unless they had more funds, but by the mode they adopted, every man who sent to school got a part of the public money;" if he was not able to pay the balance he was punished by losing the whole; which is certainly a bad feature in the practice, and a gross violation of law. Another custom is not to draw the school money for several years, and then, say once in two or three years, they can keep a crowded free school from three to six months. In some places public schools have not been taught this two years.

These examples give the practice in all the school districts in the State; the second and third named prevail the most generally; but it is not uncommon to find all the examples adopted in different districts in the same township.¹

Revenue from school lands.—The revenue from Section 16, or land given in lieu of Section 16,² was by the terms of the grant to be used for the education of the children of the township or district of country to which it belonged. The basis of distribution within the township finally came to be the number of white unmarried youth from four to twenty-one years. The different bases of distribution used before this were as follows:

1805³—So that all citizens in the township shall obtain equal advantages.

1810⁴—In proportion to the scholars and the time taught.

1825⁵—In proportion to the number of families in each district.

1834⁶—In proportion to the unmarried white youth from four to twenty-one.

In the Virginia Military District the basis for distribution by the act of February 9, 1829,⁷ was made all children from the age of four to sixteen, instead of four to twenty-one. This was changed to children from the age of four to twenty-one in 1831,⁸ and a five-hundred-dollar penalty was assessed upon county auditors if they failed to make triennially a report of the number of school youth of this age in their respective counties. In 1836¹ the proportionate amount of territory in each county was used as the basis of apportionment in this particular district.

Permanent funds.—Schools lands: In 1809² the school lands set aside for the Virginia Military District were offered for sale at a minimum price of two dollars per acre, and the funds were deposited with the state treasurer to be funded and the income used for the support of schools within this district.

The policy of selling the school lands in the rest of the state was adopted in 1827³ and was followed immediately by another act⁴ creating a permanent school fund. The money from the sale of school land was to be paid into the state treasury and placed to the credit of the particular townships to which the land belonged. This was impossible in the case of such districts as the Western Reserve, the Virginia Military District, and the United States Military District, as the land had not been given to the townships, but to the districts as a whole. In these cases the money was set aside for the use of schools in the territories named. The amount so paid in constituted an irreducible fund upon which the state pledged its faith to pay an annual interest of 6 per cent for the use of schools in the township or district.⁵ The lands were to be sold at the appraised value with no minimum price attached. This act also provided that the money from the sale of the salt lands, which had not been originally given for the use of schools, should become a permanent fund belonging in common to the people of the state for school use. To this fund was to be added any donations, bequests, etc., that might be made to the state for the use of schools. The moneys from the two last sources were to be funded until 1832, and thereafter interest was to be distributed to the counties of the state in proportion to the white male inhabitants over twenty-one years of age. These funds were loaned to the state for the purpose of building canals in 1830,⁶ and from this time on the principle was followed of using the funds for state purposes and pledging the faith of the state for the payment of annual interest on the debt so incurred.

Surplus revenue.—In 1837² the surplus revenue received from the United States was apportioned among the counties, the net income from this source to be used for the support of common schools. The method used for deriving an income was as follows: each county was held responsible for the payment of 5 per cent interest annually on the amount apportioned to it.³ This 5 per cent was paid annually to the state treasurer and redistributed throughout the state for the use of schools. Any amount of revenue that the county had derived from the fund above 5 per cent might be retained by it and used for internal improvements, for the support of common schools, or for the building of academies. The entire fund apportioned to Ohio from this source was $2,007,260.34.⁴ This fund was used in this way for the support of schools until 1850, but was finally pledged by the state for the payment of debts incurred in the building of state canals, and passed from the school finances subsequent to this date.

State school fund.—The law of 1838⁵ established for the first time a guaranteed state common-school fund of two hundred thousand dollars. This was to be derived from the interest on the surplus revenue,⁶ the interest on the proceeds of salt lands, and the revenue⁷ from banks, insurance, and bridge companies. The state was to supplement from other funds whatever amount was needed to bring the total annual revenue up to two hundred thousand dollars. The added amount, when necessary, was raised, in fact, by a state tax. The amount of this guaranteed fund was subsequently in 1842¹ reduced for one year to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and in the following year² the money arising from licenses on peddlers, from auction duties or licenses on auctioneers, and from taxes levied on lawyers and physicians was added to this fund, the effort evidently being to raise the amount of the fund without the necessity of taxation. The basis for distribution of this fund to the counties was made the number of white youth between the ages of four and twenty years, resident in the county.

Taxation.—The principle of taxation for the support of schools first appeared in the general school act of 1825,³ by which the county commissioners in each county were directed to levy a tax of one-half mill on the taxable property of the county for the use of schools. This principle continued from this date, and was later supplemented by a state tax and an optional township or district tax. The provisions of the laws concerning taxation up to, and including, the general law of 1838 are summarized in Table I, page 34. (This includes only taxation for school support. The provisions for taxation for school building purposes are given separately.)

In 1839⁴ the law was amended to allow the county commissioner to reduce the county tax to any sum not less than one mill, instead of maintaining a flat rate of two mills throughout the state as the act of 1838 had done, and in 1847,⁵ the sentiment against taxation for school support was so strong in the General Assembly that the county commissioners were forbidden to levy more than two-fifths of a mill for the use of schools. This was the lowest point reached in taxation for school support after the law of 1825.

The following year, 1848, the privilege of levying a local tax for the support of schools was extended from the township to the district.⁶ The district clerks were directed to make an estimate of the amount needed in addition to the funds provided under the laws in force to keep a school in session for six months. The district meeting was then allowed to decide by vote whether an additional tax should be levied for this purpose. In no case could this added district tax exceed one mill. The same year the county commissioners were authorized to raise the tax from two-fifths of a mill to 1 mill¹ but they were not directed to do so.

The status of taxation for the support of schools at the close of the period was as follows:

The state guaranteed a fixed school fund derived from various sources. When other sources failed to make up this sum, a state tax was levied to do so. (The fund had been reduced from two hundred thousand dollars in 1838 to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars in 1842.)

The county commissioners were directed to levy a tax in each county. This had been two mills in 1838, but was reduced to two-fifths of a mill in 1847, and was left optional, but not over one mill, in 1848.

Each township might vote to raise an added two-mill tax for the support of schools in the township.

Each district might vote to raise an added one-mill tax for the support of schools in the district.

The progress that had been made by the law of 1838 with its state-wide county tax of two mills and state tax amounting to one-half mill had been largely lost by allowing the county commissioners to reduce the amount of the county tax and by the reduction of the guaranteed school fund to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Taxation for school buildings.—The law of 1821¹ authorized the householders in any school district by a two-thirds vote to levy a tax to build a schoolhouse and to pay for the schooling of indigent pupils, and stipulated the tax should not exceed one-half the amount that might be levied for state and county taxes the same year. The next law, that of 1825,² simply said that the district meeting should provide means for building a schoolhouse and for furnishing fuel, but gave no further directions as to how money was to be raised. In 1827³ a maximum of three hundred dollars for a schoolhouse was established, and the district meeting might, by a three-fifths vote, decide whether the district should be taxed for building purposes or not. If it was decided to raise the money by a tax and the amount falling on any householder was less than one dollar, a minimum sum of one dollar was charged against him. The tax might be commuted by labor on the schoolhouse or by the furnishing of material for it. This last law evidently aroused opposition on the part of non-resident taxpayers, and in 1830⁴ an amendment to the school law provided that not more than fifty dollars might be levied in any one year for building purposes unless one-third of the property in the district was owned by residents.

⁴ O.L., XXVIII, 57.

If one-third to one-half of the property was so owned, the amount raised might be one hundred dollars. If one-third to two-thirds of the property was owned by residents, the sum was increased to two hundred dollars. This method of raising the money for buildings remained with but slight changes until 1838. The minimum tax for a resident taxpayer was reduced from one dollar to fifty cents in 1830,¹ and to twenty-five cents in 1836.² In 1838³ the decision as to a building tax for a schoolhouse was for the first time left to a majority vote of the district meeting, and the partial exemption for non-resident taxpayers and the minimum tax features disappeared.

Fines, penalties, licenses, fees, etc.—In 1827⁴ the principle of using fines for the support of schools, assessed for various offences, first appears. By the provisions of this act all fines imposed and collected by justices of the peace for offences committed were to be used for the support of schools in the district in which the offences were committed. This was repeated in 1829,⁵ and then disappeared from the school law, but the principle reappeared in a series of acts concerning various offences and remained as a definite method of school support to the end of the period. These offences and fines are so numerous that they are given here only in tabulated form (Table II).

In addition to the fines listed, the fees received from licenses for liquor selling,¹ for peddling,² and for auctioneering³ were applied for the use of schools. There were also a number of local acts of this character applying to particular towns or counties.⁴

In 1830,⁵ in the act incorporating the town of Steubenville, it is provided that for every license granted to "all groceries, porter, ale, and other houses of entertainment" there shall be paid into the county treasury "the sum of five dollars for the use of the common schools of the county." A similar provision is found in the act incorporating the city of Chillicothe,⁶ in 1838, except that the money is to be paid to the district of the city. Acts of the same general nature occur, applying to Medina, Huron, and Erie counties,⁷ and to the towns of Cuyahoga Falls,⁸ Fulton,⁹ and Akron,¹⁰ and in 1845 an act was passed authorizing the towns of Painesville and Norwalk¹¹ to levy an annual tax "on all dogs six months old and upwards" for the use of common schools.

CONTROL AND SUPERVISION OF SCHOOLS

Ohio was especially weak in developing any plan of control or supervision. The law of 1825¹² and succeeding laws said that the county examiners might visit and inspect schools, but there was no compulsion placed upon them, no pay for the duty if performed, and no authority given to them in case they decided to make such inspection. In 1838¹³ the establishment of the offices of state, county, and township superintendents would seem, at first view, to give the machinery for efficient control and supervision, but an inspection of the law will show that the actual control exercised was weak and ineffective. The only man in the entire system who was primarily engaged in school work was the state superintendent, and at the end of three years the office was abolished,¹⁴ and the work transferred to the secretary of state, who was allowed four hundred dollars a year for the extra clerical work thus placed upon him.

Samuel Lewis¹ in the three years he served as state superintendent accomplished much, but it was through arousing sentiment in favor of common schools and in collecting and presenting educational facts to the General Assembly and to the state at large, and not through the working of the system, except as it aided him in the collection of the desired facts and as he educated school officers in their duties through manuals, reports, and other educational material.²

With the transfer of the office to the secretary of state it became, naturally, largely clerical in character, as the secretary of state was devoted primarily to other duties. Similarly, the office of county superintendent was simply added to the duties of the county auditor, and that of the township superintendent to the duties of the township clerk. These men, too, were primarily chosen for work of a different nature, and the school duties were in many instances an unwelcome addition.

It is true that the law gave the township superintendent certain control over the district, investing him with powers to appoint directors if the district failed to elect them, or to perform in person the duties of the directors if those he appointed failed to serve. There was no machinery, however, to compel the township superintendent to act in the matter. He was also required by law to visit the schools in each district once in each year, but in 1839³ it was made optional with the township trustees to excuse him from this duty, and his total pay for supervision in any one school was fixed at a maximum of one dollar for the year. On the whole the township clerks seem to have accepted the responsibility and to have acted for the best interests of the schools.

Mr. Lewis in his second report speaks of the working of the law at this point as follows:

Elections have very generally been held in the districts in September, 1838, and where they have been omitted the township clerks have, in most cases, made proper appointments, so that there are now school officers in nearly all the school districts and they are making the arrangements for schools. . . . The power of township clerks, to appoint district officers, is sometimes complained of, but without this provision or some other effecting the same object, organization could not take place.

There will be this winter at least one thousand schools that but for this provision would not have existed. Township clerks only act where the district has forgotten or neglected to act, and it would be unpardonable to suffer fifty thousand youth to go without instruction for want of officers to regulate the schools. . . . I am satisfied that most of the township clerks desire most heartily to promote the interest of the schools, pay or no pay, but they are generally poor and cannot afford to spend much time without compensation. Letters every day coming to my hands satisfy me that no money will be better laid out than that which secures the services of patriotic and public spirited township superintendents.¹

While these quotations show the general attitude of these newly appointed officers as favorable to the schools, there were many individual instances where, through laxity or ignorance, the work was not done. One of the county auditors writing to Mr. Lewis says: "Great difficulties are found in school matters by the negligence of school district officers and township clerks, not that they are opposed to the common school system, but they complain of having so much to do without compensation, consequently they will not bother themselves with the matter."²

Another says: "I can assign no reason for the neglect of the township clerks in this matter . . . but from want of attention merely. . . ." "The township clerks have not generally made accurate returns."³ "The carelessness of district officers has given township clerks an excuse, and my report is very deficient," are among other comments from auditor's letters cited by Mr. Lewis.

The only effective measures to compel the districts to establish schools were through the retention of the district's share of money from the school fund, and the moneys collected by taxation, in case of failure to keep school. The law of 1825⁴ said that no district might receive its share of the money so collected except for the wages of a teacher duly employed and certified. There was no specification as to the length of time the teacher must be employed. If the district failed for a period of three years to hire a teacher and keep a school, the money due it was to be appropriated to the districts that did so. In 1829¹ the provisions were repeated, and a minimum term of three months was established as a condition of receiving the district's proportion of school tax due.

There was a fine of two dollars assessed on any person elected as a director or clerk and refusing to serve,² and also fines on the district officers responsible for making returns of the enumeration of school youth³ in case of failure to report. It was found necessary in 1848⁴ to pass a special act for the purpose of securing school statistics from the districts and townships. This forbade the township treasurers to pay any teacher a salary unless there was presented with the order an abstract of the teacher's record of attendance. The township treasurer was fined ten dollars unless he settled annually with the auditor of the county, and the possession of these abstracts was a necessary preliminary to the settlement. Other than this the state devised no means for controlling the educational procedure of the district.

CERTIFICATION OF TEACHERS

In 1821⁵ the district school committee was authorized to employ competent teachers, and no mention was made of certification. In 1825⁶ the principle of county certification appeared and with the exception of a two-year period, 1836 to 1838, remained until 1850. The law of 1825 provided for the appointment of three examiners of common schools in each county by the Court of Common Pleas, who should examine and certificate teachers and, as previously noted, might visit and examine schools. No teacher could legally recover any part of the pay due from public funds unless a certificate had been granted to such teacher.

In 1827⁷ the Court of Common Pleas was allowed to appoint such number of examiners as they might deem expedient, not to exceed one for each organized township in the county. It was the evident intent of this law to allow single examiners, for the sake of convenience, to examine within the township.

⁶ O.L., XXIII, 36.

⁷ O.L., XXV, 65.

In 1829¹ the Court of Common Pleas was directed to appoint not less than five examiners nor more than the number of organized townships in the county, and any two examiners might grant certificates.

In 1831² the examiners were directed to give the certificate in the branches in which the teacher was found qualified to teach, and no certificate was to be granted unless the candidate was qualified to teach reading, writing, and arithmetic.

The examiners might require the examination to be public and could determine upon uniform forms of certification.

This law was evidently deemed a little too rigorous and was amended at the following session in December, 1831,³ to permit a district that wished to do so to employ a female teacher to teach reading, writing, and spelling only, and the examiners were authorized, on the presentation of a written request from the directors, to grant a certificate in these subjects.

In 1834⁴ the court was directed to appoint five examiners, and the examination was to be given publicly each month at the county seat, with the provision that the examiners might appoint one examiner in each township to examine female teachers only. Reading, writing, and arithmetic were required for all certificates.

In 1836⁵ the township became the unit for certification, and the method of choosing examiners changed. Each township was to elect annually three examiners, but with the code of 1838⁶ the county became definitely the unit for certification, and the mode of appointment was again by the selection of the Court of Common Pleas. The number of examiners was fixed at three. Examinations were to be held quarterly by the board. Each teacher must be qualified to teach reading, writing, and arithmetic, and the certificate stated what other branches the teacher was qualified to teach. No teacher in any common school was allowed to teach a study not named in the certificate. In 1849⁷ English and geography were added to the requirements for certification.

SCHOOL STUDIES

No mention was made of the subjects to be taught in the common schools until 1834,¹ when reading, writing, and arithmetic and "other necessary branches" were specified. The state insisted on nothing more than these subjects, but in 1838² allowed other studies to be taught at the option of the directors, and allowed any other language beside English to be taught, but the three R's must be taught in English. This was amended in 1839³ as a concession to German settlers⁴ to allow each school district to have its school taught in whatever language it might prefer. In 1849⁵ on application of three householders the directors were instructed to add English and geography to the subjects taught.

LENGTH OF SCHOOL YEAR

The minimum length of the school year was first fixed at three months in 1829⁶ for any school receiving an appropriation of the money raised by taxation, and as much longer than three months as the appropriation paid the wages of the teacher. Nothing was done to extend the time until 1838,⁷ when the township superintendent was directed to estimate for the township the amount it would be necessary to raise by taxation in addition to the funds already provided to furnish six months good schooling to all the white youth of the township. The decision as to raising the amount needed to maintain the schools six months was decided by the voters at the township election, who voted "school tax" or "no school tax." A six months' school remained the ideal held up by the law for district schools until 1850.

That this modest ideal of a six months' school was not commonly reached is shown in Mr. Lewis' first report, in which he gave the total number of children of school age in the state as 468,812; the number attending more than two months and less than four as 84,296, and those attending over four months as 62,144.⁸ These figures show that 322,372 children of school age either attended school less than two months in the year or that they did not attend at all. In his last report, three years later, for 1839, he gives the total number of schools (public) as 13,049—partly estimated—and the average length of the term as four months; the total number of pupils in attendance as 455,427, an increase of over 300,000.¹ These figures are a significant indication of the changed attitude toward public schools that the law of 1838 had wrought under the leadership of a capable and devoted state superintendent.

SCHOOL OFFICERS

The township trustees were throughout the period given the power of establishing districts. District officers were as follows:

1814—Three district trustees.²

1821—Three district trustees and a collector.³

1825—Three directors.⁴

1827—Three directors and a treasurer to be appointed by the directors.⁵

1829—Three directors, a clerk, and a treasurer.⁶

1838—Three directors, the directors appointing one of their own number as clerk and treasurer.⁷ The law of 1838 also created the offices of state, county, and township superintendents, the two latter being ex officio attached to the offices of county auditor and township clerk.

1840—The office of state superintendent was abolished, and its clerical functions transferred to the office of the secretary of state.⁸

1848—Counties were given the right on their own initiative to elect county superintendents of schools.⁹

SCHOOLS FOR COLORED CHILDREN

The first provision found in the general laws for the education of colored children occurs in 1848,¹⁰ when a department of common schools for black and mulatto children was created. Prior to this time the property of colored people had been exempt from taxation for school purposes. This law provided that their property should be taxed the same as property of white people, and the money used to support colored schools wherever they were established, but added to the common school funds in those districts in which colored children were allowed to attend the common schools.

Any city, town, village, or township containing twenty colored children was created a district for the purpose of establishing a colored school, and the colored citizens were given authority to organize by the election of directors, in accord with the general school law. If there were less than twenty colored children in the areas enumerated, they were allowed to attend the common schools unless there was a written protest filed by someone having a child in the school. In the latter case they were not allowed to attend, and the property of colored people was not taxed. At the next session of the legislature, in 1849,¹ the law was changed, and the authorities in towns, cities, villages, and townships were required to create one or more districts for colored children if they were not admitted to common schools. The colored citizens then organized with their own officers and supported the schools by taxation upon their own property.

CITY AND VILLAGE SCHOOLS

Ohio's growth in population in the early decades of the nineteenth century was a phenomenal one. In 1800, three years before statehood, her rank in population was eighteenth. In 1820 she stood fifth in the sisterhood of states, and in the next ten years the numbers within her borders again almost doubled, jumping from 581,434 in 1820 to 937,903 in 1830.²

This growth in the early years was almost wholly a rural one. In 1820 there were only two towns in the state with a population of 1,000 or over: Cincinnati with 9,640, and Dayton, estimated to have 1,000. Ten years later Cincinnati had grown to a city of 24,830, Dayton and Columbus were approaching 3,000 each—2,950 and 2,435, respectively—while three other towns, Cleveland, Springfield, and Canton, had just passed the 1,000 mark.

In the years from 1830 to 1850 the growth of towns and cities was a rapid one. Cincinnati had increased to 46,340; Dayton, Columbus, and Cleveland had each passed 6,000, and there were eight other towns in the state with a population of over 2,000 each according to the census reports of 1840; while by 1850 Cincinnati was a thriving metropolis of 115,435, Columbus and Cleveland were vigorous young cities of 17,000 each, Dayton had something over 10,000 inhabitants, and Zanesville and Chillicothe were rapidly approaching this number, while fifteen other centers had attained a population of 3,000 to 6,000 each.¹

The school legislation of the first thirty years of Ohio's statehood recognized only the district school in the general school laws that were passed. This was partly a reflection of the rural character of the state in these early years, and partly a result of the decentralizing tendency in school affairs that the early settlers had brought with them. It was not until the law of 1838 was passed that any recognition was given to the fact that the educational needs of cities and towns were not the same as those of the country districts.

Samuel Lewis speaking to the legislature at this period said:

In towns and large villages, the common schools are poorer than in the country. In the latter, neighborhoods depend more upon them, and, of course, take a deeper interest in their control, while in the former there is too frequently but little attention paid to these schools by persons able to provide other means of instruction.²

A few cities and towns had early felt the inadequacy of the general laws in providing any suitable system of schools, and had asked and received special charters from the state. By 1840 a number of municipalities had organized their schools under special charters, and in the years from 1840 to 1850 there was a general awakening in the urban communities to the need of better provision for public schools.

This aroused interest was shown in the school charters of Cincinnati, Toledo, Cleveland, Portsmouth, Zanesville, Dayton, Columbus, Mt. Vernon, and, finally, Akron, and the generalization of the "Akron Act" in such form that all municipalities in the state—of 200 or more inhabitants—could make use of it.

There was much that was progressive and enlightened for the period in the legislation for Ohio's cities and towns from about 1830 to 1850. The one great lack—found in all Ohio's school legislation prior to 1850, and for a half-century after that—was the lack of any form of compulsion. The general applications of the laws for municipalities were wholly permissive in character. They simply pointed out ways in which the schools could be legally established and organized, but, however excellent and needed these ways might be, no municipality was under the slightest compulsion to follow them.

The earliest special legislation for towns is found in the case of Marietta.¹ The legislature in 1825 granted her the right to vote in town meeting a sum for the support of schools. There was no further legislation for Marietta until 1841,² when an act was passed dividing the town, which had been united into one district by the law of 1838, into separate districts again, with three directors for each, and the ordinary rural district system.

Cincinnati.—Cincinnati was the leader in all the early efforts for better educational conditions. In 1829³ she set an example to the rest of the state by securing a school charter that gave the city an organized, tax-supported, free system of common schools.

This charter divided the city into ten districts, two for each ward, and provided for the building in each district of a two-story building of brick or stone.

The city council was required to provide at the expense of the city for the support of common schools, and to levy a tax of one mill on all the property of the city as long as needed to defray the expense of acquiring sites and erecting buildings, and an additional tax of one mill for the support of schools.

The voters in each ward elected annually a trustee and visitor of common schools. The persons so elected constituted the Board of Trustees and Visitors of Common Schools, and had general supervision of school affairs. They were authorized to employ teachers and to visit schools as often as once a month. They also were to appoint six examiners and inspectors, whose duty it was to examine and certify teachers, and to visit and inspect schools. Once a year a public examination of the schools was to be given under the direction of the mayor, the Board of Trustees and Visitors, and the Board of Examiners. The schools were to be open at least six months of each year, and to be free to all white children. Black and mulatto children were specifically excluded. Reading, writing, spelling, and arithmetic made up the curriculum.

While numerous amendments occur, there are few significant changes before 1850. In 1840¹ German schools were established, and evening schools provided for "such male youth over twelve years of age as are prevented by their daily avocation from attending day schools." The latter schools were to be open in the months of November, December, January, and February.

In 1845² the trustees were authorized to divide the city into suitable districts without reference to ward boundaries, and in 1846³ they were given power to establish such other grade of schools as might seem necessary and have such other studies taught therein as they might prescribe. In 1850⁴ provision was made for the annual election by the qualified voters of a "Superintendent of Common Schools, whose duty it shall be to visit and superintend all the common schools in said city, to establish courses of study, and perform such other duties as the Board may prescribe."

City of Ohio and Toledo.—In 1836⁵ and 1837⁶ the city councils in these two cities were given general superintendence over the common schools, with power to divide the city into districts, to erect school buildings, and to make provision for the government and instruction of children therein. It was left wholly optional to the city council as to what should be done.

Cleveland.—Provision for the government of the Cleveland schools was included in the city charter, adopted in 1836.⁷ The provisions were quite similar to the Cincinnati plan. The council appointed one person from each ward instead of the voters electing as in Cincinnati. The people so appointed constituted the Board of Managers of Common Schools.

In 1848⁸ the Board of Managers was made five for the entire city instead of one from each ward, and the council was authorized to establish a high school, for which purpose the city was to constitute one high-school district.

Portsmouth and Zanesville.—In 1838⁹ the city charter of Portsmouth was amended to include most of the provisions of the Cincinnati plan, and in the following year¹ the city of Zanesville secured a charter for the support of schools that had many similar features. The Zanesville charter provided for the election of six directors to be known as the Board of Education. The schools were to be kept in constant operation except for "reasonable vacations," and any deficiency in funds sufficient to keep the schools in constant operation was raised by a levy upon the parents. The board was allowed to exempt indigent students from payment of school fees.

General law for cities and towns before the Akron Act.—The general law of 1838² made each incorporated city, town, or borough, not specially regulated by charter, a separate school district. The voters in such a district elected three directors, who were given corporate authority and power to increase the number of directors so that there might be one for each subdistrict. They were authorized to divide the territory for which they were responsible and to establish schools of different grades therein. The question of an additional tax to furnish a school at least six months each year was to be decided by the vote of the community. The general law, as was so usual in Ohio legislation, merely pointed the way, but did not attempt to enforce the organization of city and town schools. The one compulsory feature that appears occurred the next year, 1839,³ and stated that in towns, cities, and boroughs it was the duty of the directors to provide a sufficient number of night schools for the male youth over twelve years of age whose "daily avocation" kept them from attending day schools. While this law was compulsory in form, there was no machinery devised for its enforcement.

Dayton, Columbus, and Mt. Vernon.—In 1841⁴ and 1845⁵ the cities of Dayton, Columbus, and Mt. Vernon were granted special charters for the government of their schools. Dayton and Columbus each continued the principle of school rates in addition to taxation. The schools were to be kept in constant operation except for vacations, and any deficiency made up by a levy on the parents. The general features of control were similar to the Cincinnati plan.

The Mt. Vernon charter retained the district system and made each council member a special school director for his ward. Building taxes were to be collected from the subdistricts in which the buildings were erected, and were not assessed on the property of the city in general.

Akron.—In 1847¹ Akron secured school legislation that was especially significant, as the legislature the following year² allowed cities, towns, and villages to adopt the provisions of the act and its amendments on petition of two-thirds of the voters, and in 1849³ enacted most of its provisions into a general law. By this means the Akron law became the plan usually followed in the establishment of graded schools in Ohio. This legislation is of sufficient importance to merit a brief description of the steps that were taken in securing it, and the school conditions in Akron preceding its enactment. The description, with some omissions, is the one given by Judge Bryan in an "Historical Sketch of the Akron Public Schools."

In 1846 there were within the incorporated limits of the village of Akron six hundred and ninety children between the ages of four and sixteen. Of this number there was an average attendance at the public and other schools the year through of not more than three hundred and seventy-five. During the summer of 1846 one of the district schools was taught in the back-room of a dwelling house. Another was taught in an uncouth, inconvenient and uncomfortable building gratuitously furnished by Captain Howe for the use of the district. There were private schools, but these were taught in rooms temporarily hired and unsuited for the purpose in many respects. . . . It was, in view of this state of things, that Reverend I. Jennings, then a young man and pastor of the Congregational Church of Akron, self-moved, set himself to reorganize the common schools of Akron. There were many friends of a better education in the place who co-operated with Mr. Jennings, and on the 16th day of May, 1846, at a public meeting of the citizens, a committee was appointed of which he was chairman "to take into consideration our present educational provisions and the improvement, if any, which may be made therein."⁴

As a result of this interest, a committee of three was appointed to draw up plans and secure necessary legislation. The plan of the committee was as follows:

1. Let the whole village be incorporated into one school district.
2. Let there be established six primary schools in different parts of the village so as best to accommodate the whole.

3. Let there be one grammar school centrally located where instruction may be given in the various studies and parts of studies not provided for in the primary schools and yet requisite to a respectable English education.

4. Let there be gratuitous admission to each school in the system for the children of residents, with the following restrictions, viz.: No pupil shall be admitted to the grammar schools who fails to sustain a thorough examination in the primary school, and the teachers shall have power with the advice of the superintendents to exclude for misconduct in extreme cases, and to classify the pupils as the best good of the schools may seem to require.

5. The expense of establishing and sustaining this system of schools shall be provided for: first, by appropriating all the school money the inhabitants of the village are entitled to, and whatever funds or property may be at the disposal of the board for this purpose; secondly, by a tax to be levied by the Common Council upon the taxable property of this village for the balance.

6. Let six superintendents be chosen by the Common Council, who shall be charged with perfecting the system thus generally defined, the bringing of it into operation, and the control of it when brought into operation. Let the six superintendents be so chosen that the term of office of two of them shall expire each year.

The essential provisions of the plan adopted by this committee were incorporated in the law enacted February 8, 1847.¹ The more important features of this law may be summarized as follows:

1. The election of a board of education of six members, which should have full control of school property and school funds.

2. The incorporation of the city into one school district.

3. Provision for six or more primary schools and one central grammar school to teach "subjects requisite to a respectable English Education."

4. Free admission to all schools.

5. Examinations for promotion, and teachers given the power to classify pupils.

6. Assessment as a tax by the city council of the amount estimated by the board for erecting schoolhouses and for conducting the schools.

7. All school property vested in the city council.
8. Three examiners appointed by the council.
9. Annual public examinations.

In the original law there was no limit placed on the amount that might be estimated as necessary for school expense by the Board of Education, and the law directed the council to levy the estimate as a tax. In 1848,¹ in order to make a concession that would meet the objection of the property-owners who opposed this feature, the maximum tax that might be raised in any one year for current expense was placed at four mills. The power of making the levy was taken from the council and placed in the hands of the Board of Education, which reported its estimate direct to the county auditor, who was directed to assess the amount in the same manner as other taxes.

On February 14, 1848,² the act was extended to any incorporated town, city, or borough in the state upon petition of two-thirds of the qualified voters. This required too large a majority to allow the act to be adopted in localities where there was not an overwhelming sentiment in favor of better school conditions, and in the following year³ a general act was passed for cities and towns which might be adopted by a majority vote. The main provisions of this act were similar to the Akron laws, as may be seen by inspection of its chief features:

1. Any incorporated city, town, or village including within its limits and the territory attached, for school purposes, two hundred inhabitants might organize into a single school district.
2. The question of adopting the law to be decided by a majority vote of the community.
3. A board of education of six members elected by the voters.
4. Building expenses and purchase of sites to be decided by popular vote. When so decided and reported to the county auditor, the amount to be levied as a tax upon the property of the community.
5. Primary and graded schools provided for. No language other than English or German to be taught.
6. Schools to be free to all children in the district.

³ O.L., XLVII, 22.

7. Schools to be kept in operation not less than thirty-six nor more than forty-four weeks each year.

8. Board of education to estimate the amount needed for running expenses not to exceed a four-mill tax annually. Auditor to levy the amount estimated as a tax.

9. If the amount raised is insufficient to keep the schools open thirty-six weeks, the balance to be raised by school rates on the parents. Indigent pupils exempt from such rates.

10. A board of three examiners to be appointed by the school board.

In 1850¹ the provisions of this act were extended to townships and to special districts, provided such township or district had five hundred inhabitants. The question of the adoption of the law was left, as in the case of towns, to the majority vote of the territory interested.

By far the most interesting and significant feature in the educational legislation of Ohio in the years just preceding 1850 are these laws passed for towns and cities. They indicate an awakening in the urban districts to the need of universal free education. Cincinnati had pointed the way to the other cities of the state since 1829, and had been followed by a considerable number of municipalities. The law passed for the benefit of Akron came when the social consciousness of towns and cities was ready for it, and the legislature responded to this sentiment by allowing communities to adopt its provisions, at first by a majority of two-thirds, but within a year by a simple majority.² The state made possible a town or city system that, on the whole, was an excellent system for the period, but the question of organizing under the system was left wholly to the educational interests or municipal pride of the individual communities.

² Not all towns that adopted it were satisfied. Between 1847 and 1850 three special acts were passed repealing the provisions of the Akron law in the case of three towns that adopted it. Seven other special acts for schools in towns and cities were passed in these three years to meet the desires of municipalities that wished certain different features.

CHAPTER III

THE PUBLIC-SCHOOL LANDS

An enormous mass of legislation was passed by the General Assembly of Ohio, between the years 1803 and 1850, concerning the state school lands. Many of these laws were general in character, many applied to large individual tracts such as the Western Reserve, the Virginia Military Reserve, the United States Military Lands, and the Ohio Company and Symmes Purchases, and in addition to these there were approximately five hundred that were wholly local or special in their application.

A brief description of the more important of these reserves and purchases, some explanation of the various systems of survey used in Ohio, an account of the varying nature of the school grant in these different divisions, and a study of the accompanying maps and diagrams are an almost necessary prerequisite to any clear understanding of this legislation.

The most important of these grants, with their total acreage, including the school lands, are as follows:¹

	Acres
The Virginia Military Reserve.....	4,204,800
The Western Reserve.....	3,840,000
The United States Military Lands.....	2,560,000
The Ohio Company's Purchase.....	1,227,168
The Symmes Purchase.....	311,682

In addition to these there were a number of smaller tracts, but the names of only two of them appear in the discussion of the school land legislation. These two were the Refugee Tract, 138,240 acres, and the Moravian Tract,² 12,000 acres.

Over 12,000,000 acres were included in these various special districts. The remaining portions of the state were known as Congress Lands, and belonged to the federal government.³ That portion of the government land which lay on the eastern border of the state, just south of the Western Reserve, was the first to be surveyed into townships, and was commonly spoken of as the Seven Ranges, because seven ranges of townships west from the Pennsylvania line were included in this first survey.¹

Graham, "The Land and Township System of Ohio," Annual Report of the Secretary of State to the Governor of the State of Ohio for the Year 1885, p. 28).

It has already been pointed out that a state-wide grant of land for school purposes began with Ohio's admission as a state, and that the precedent thus established has been followed in admitting all the later states.² It is also true that the rectangular method of laying out townships with meridian lines, sections, towns, and ranges was first practiced in the Ohio surveys,³ and the method here established became, too, the universal practice in all subsequent government surveys.

Two great American inventions were thus first tried in Ohio—the state-wide grant of school lands, and the rectangular method of survey into six-mile square townships, with thirty-six sections, of one mile square, in each. Ohio was not only the first state to receive Section 16⁴ as a school grant; it was the first state to have any Section 16.

The surveys in Ohio, however, were not all uniform in the method of laying out and subdividing the townships. The Seven Ranges, as has been said, were first surveyed. The townships here were laid out six miles square, and divided into thirty-six sections, each one mile square, but the numbering of the sections differs from that in the later surveys. The numbering was that shown on page 56, Fig. I. Section 1 is located in the lower south-east corner of the township, and the sections are numbered upward, in tiers of six, from the base line of the township. This method of laying out townships and numbering sections was also used in the Ohio Company and Symmes Purchases.

In the Western Reserve and the United States Military Lands the townships were laid out in five-mile squares instead of six, and at first were not surveyed into sections, but simply divided into four 20,000-acre blocks in each township and these numbered as shown in the diagram on page 56, Fig. IV.

The Virginia Military District is the only part of Ohio in which the rectangular system of survey was not employed. The early settlers here chose each "for himself his lands, locating them by any natural boundary, however irregular it might be, taking care only to get the full amount of land demanded by the warrants."¹ "This led to no regular survey, and, as a consequence, an irregularity in township and county lines followed, which were generally based on the boundaries of the warrants."

⁴ Section 16 was the section reserved for school purposes in each township in the "Congress Lands" of Ohio and in the Ohio Company and Symmes Purchases. The precedent established has been followed in all the later states, and Section 16 has regularly been the school section. Since 1848, with the admission of Oregon, Section 36 has been added to the school grant.

The rest of the state was made up of Congress Lands, and in all of these the method of survey was that of the six-mile square township, and the division into sections. The manner of numbering the sections was changed from that in the Seven Ranges and in the Ohio Company and Symmes Purchases.

Section 1 in these lands is located in the upper right-hand corner—the northeast corner—of the township, and the sections are numbered to the west and east alternately, Section 6 lying in the northwest corner of the township, and Section 7 located just beneath Section 6 and numbering back to the east again, as shown in the diagram on page 56, Fig. II.

This method of numbering was settled by federal legislation in 1799² and has remained the same since that time.

The Land Ordinance of 1785³ "for ascertaining the mode of disposing of lands in the Western Territory," provided that "there shall be reserved the lot No. 16 of every township for the maintenance of public schools within said township."

In accordance with this provision, as has been seen, Section 16 was reserved for schools in both the Ohio Company and Symmes Purchases. In these two tracts there is also found a reservation for religion as well as for education, a thing not true elsewhere in the state. As a part of the bargain in the purchase of these lands Section 29 in each township was granted by the government to the purchasers for religious purposes, and these sections have ever since been known as the Ministerial Lands.

When Ohio was admitted to the Union the provisions of the Ordinance of 1785, concerning school lands, were carried out as fully as possible in the rest of the state. In all of the Congress Lands Section 16 in each township was permanently reserved for the schools of the township. It was not in the power of Congress to grant Section 16 in such tracts as the Western Reserve, the Virginia Military Reserve, and the United States Military Lands. These lands either did not belong to the federal government or there were prior claims and unsatisfied land warrants that stood in the way of any such granting of specific sections. The United States did not own the land on the Western Reserve, and in the case of the so-called Military Lands the private ownership of much of the land, through the taking up of land scrip or bounties by the soldiers of the Revolution, in the service of the federal government and Virginia, might conflict in any township.

For this reason the assigning of school land in these portions of the state could not take the form of reserving Section 16 in each township. Some other method of setting aside one thirty-sixth part of the land for the use of the schools in these regions had to be devised.

The land originally reserved for schools in the Virginia Military Lands was, in amount, one thirty-sixth of the entire tract, to be selected by the legislature of Ohio from the unlocated lands, after the warrants issued by the state of Virginia had been satisfied.¹

In 1807² Congress, in response to a petition from the state legislature,³ appropriated eighteen quarter-townships and three sections in lieu of the original grant. These new lands, however, were not located within the Reserve itself, but to the northeast, between the Western Reserve and the United States Military Reserve. This territory was in Congress Lands, title to which had been purchased from the Indians.

In two very significant ways a grant of this kind differed from the grant of Section 16 in each township. In the first place, an assignment of this character could not be made for the township individually, but had to be for the schools of the Virginia Military Reserve as a whole. Secondly, the school lands were at a distance, and not something immediately at hand and under the observation of all as in the case of Section 16 in each township. Something of this same sort was true in the case of each of the other large reserves, and this was bound to be reflected in some differences in legislation concerning these various grants.

² Nashee, A Compilation of Laws, Treaties and Ordinances Which Relate to Lands in the State of Ohio, p. 157.

³ O.L., V, 132.

The land reserved for the United States Military Tract¹ was similarly assigned by quarter-townships, but the reservation was made within the United States Military Lands themselves. The amount of the grant in this case was fourteen quarter-townships. It must be remembered in comparing this grant or that of the Western Reserve with those of other parts of the state that the townships in these two regions contain only twenty-five square miles, as compared with thirty-six elsewhere.

The school lands first selected for the Western Reserve consisted of fourteen quarter-townships, not located in the Reserve itself, but in the United States Military Lands. To this was added by the act of Congress in 1834² land that amounted to 37,758 acres, to be selected from the unlocated lands of the United States within the state, by sections, half-sections, and quarter-sections. This additional grant of 1834 was in lieu of one thirty-sixth part of that land in the Western Reserve, which belonged to the Indian tribes when Ohio was admitted, but the Indian title to which had been extinguished in 1805.

The Moravian Tract, mentioned once or twice in the legislation, was a comparatively small reserve of 12,000 acres in Tuscarawas County, originally granted by Congress to the Society of United Brethren, in trust for Christian Indians. These lands reverted to the United States in 1824, and in the same year Congress³ set aside one thirty-sixth part of the tract for the use of schools.

The location of the more important of these various tracts can be most easily gained by consulting the map on page 55.

The Western Reserve is a strip of land on the northern boundary of the state approximately thirty-five miles wide and one hundred and twenty miles long, extending west from the Pennsylvania border. It was this land, which Connecticut claimed and to which she refused to cede her interests when the other states were yielding their claims in the Northwest Territory to the United States, that was known as the Connecticut Western Reserve, or, more generally, simply as the Western Reserve.

The Virginia Military District is located between the Scioto and Little Miami rivers, projecting to the northward considerably past the middle of the state. It takes its name from the fact that this portion of the state was "reserved by Virginia from her cession of the territory northwest of the Ohio River, for the satisfaction of land bounties issued to her troops upon Continental establishment."¹

³ Ibid., 56.

The United States had also set aside a large tract of land to be used in paying the claims of her soldiers in the Revolutionary War. This reservation was known as the United States Military Lands, and is located just a little to the east and north of the center of the state.

It is a section of the state fifty miles in width on its eastern border, beginning at the northern line of the original Seven Ranges of townships first surveyed, and following the western boundary of the Seven Ranges fifty miles south. Its southern boundary extends from this point directly west to the Scioto River, while on the west the Scioto itself is the natural barrier; on the north it is bounded by the Greenville Treaty Line (the old Indian boundary line), running from the Scioto back to the Seven Ranges.²

In all these grants the purpose and intent of Congress was that the land should be for the use of schools in the particular township in which Section 16 was located, or where it was impossible to grant Section 16, that the lands should be for the use of the particular area for which the grant was made.

The care of the lands was vested in the legislature of the state, for the use of the particular townships and districts interested.³ Some explanation of the excessive amount of legislation concerning these lands is found if one keeps clearly in mind the terms of the original grant and the ever-present tendency of the Ohio legislature to allow communities, so far as it could legally be done, to conduct their own affairs.

In all the school-land legislation passed in Ohio during this period, the legislature, formally at least, guarded against any diversion of the money received from these lands, but largely followed the desire of the local township or territory as to the handling of the lands, after setting up the formal legal guards. The lands were not regarded, and were not intended, as a grant to the state at large, and it is perhaps only natural that an attempt should have been made to carry out the desires of the townships and districts to which the lands were felt to belong. Added to this there was the disposition to be lenient with the early settlers on the lands. No doubt, justice was not done to the cause of education, but it must be remembered that the schools had no advocate, while the petitioner asking special privileges or terms in regard to the sale or lease of lands was a concrete fact with concrete desires and needs, and the legislature doubtless felt that it had done its whole duty if the terms of the grant were formally protected.

Certain general policies of handling the lands may be outlined before the legislation is discussed in greater detail. These are: the policy of temporary leasing, 1803 to 1817; the policy of permanent leasing, 1817 to 1823; preparation for selling the lands, with temporary leasing, 1823 to 1827; the policy of selling the lands outright, 1827 to 1850.

The evident intent of the first acts concerning school lands was to devise a means of making them productive and valuable and to keep the lands themselves as a permanent source of revenue.

On April 15, 1803,¹ the legislature passed an act that provided for leasing Section 16 for a term that was not to exceed seven years, and the lands in the United States Military Tract, which included both the grants to that tract and to the Western Reserve, for a period not to exceed fifteen years.

The rent was to be paid by certain specified improvements. On each quarter-section (160 acres) fifteen acres were to be cleared and fenced in separate fields, five acres were to be sowed in timothy or red clover, three acres to be planted with one hundred thrifty and growing apple trees, and the remaining seven acres prepared for plow land. The leasing was to be carried on by agents in the several counties or districts appointed by the governor, and the leases were to be granted to those who guaranteed to make the required improvements in the shortest period of time.

The intention was to attract settlers who were unable to buy land or pay rent, and have them by their labor turn the school land into an attractive and productive piece of property, which would command a definite revenue. The difficulty with the plan from the lessees' standpoint was that, just at the time the land became productive, he must either move or begin to pay rent for improvements which he himself had made. With land cheap and abundant on every hand and terms easy, the ambitious and desirable settlers were not attracted by a proposition that did not allow them to keep the land on which they settled and the improvements which they had themselves made.

The results were evidently not satisfactory, for on February 20, 1805,¹ an act was passed giving the township trustees authority to lease the lands in their respective townships for a term not to exceed fifteen years to those who made the most "advantageous proposals." This was followed in 1806² by an act which allowed any surveyed township in which there were twenty electors to incorporate and choose trustees for the special management of Section 16. The section was to be laid off in lots of eighty to two hundred acres, and not more than one lot could be leased by any one person. It was made the duty of the trustees to guard against waste and to see that the terms of the lease were complied with. The provisions of these acts left the management of the lands and the terms of leasing wholly in the hands of the township, except for the fact that a fifteen-year term could not be exceeded and not more nor less than a specified amount leased to any one person.

None of the acts so far had made any provision for the land granted to the Virginia Military Tract for the use of schools. It will be remembered that this consisted of some eighteen townships lying outside the district and not located so that it could be locally managed.

By an act passed in 1809³ these lands were offered for sale to the highest bidder at a minimum price of two dollars per acre, the purchaser receiving a ninety-nine year lease, renewable forever, with no provision for revaluation. It was the evident design to sell these lands out at once and create a fund the proceeds from which might be available for school purposes when needed.⁴ The act provided that the lands were to be advertised in four newspapers within the state, and newspapers at Pittsburgh and Brownsville, Pennsylvania, and Wheeling, Virginia.

The purchaser was to pay down the sum charged against each quarter section for the expense of surveying and offering the land for sale, and on the purchase price yearly interest of 6 per cent for-

³ O.L., VII, 109.

ever. Succeeding legislatures were given the right to make such commutations as they might deem expedient. This clause was evidently intended to leave the way open for legislation that would permit a cash payment in lieu of the 6 per cent annual rental.

The terms were made still easier for the purchaser by the act of 1810,¹ which provided that the amount paid down on each quarter section should be ten dollars (to pay for surveying, advertising, etc.), and that the 6 per cent interest should not begin until five years from the date of sale. The postponement of interest money for five years was doubtless made to meet the competition of United States land offered for sale within the state on easy terms and with taxes deferred for the first five years after purchase. Each purchaser was required by this act to build a cabin and clear three acres of land within three years.

In the same year² an act was passed allowing the township trustees to receive either money or produce as rent from Section 16, and requiring the lessee to make such improvements as the trustees thought proper, and in 1814³ it was made illegal for any lessee of school lands to act as township trustee or treasurer.

This covers the main features of the land policy during the period of temporary leasing. Beginning with 1816⁴ in the Virginia Military Tract, and 1817⁵ in the rest of the state, the policy was inaugurated of granting permanent leases with a revaluation of the lands at stated periods.

The policy of selling the Virginia Military Lands was changed for the lands that were still unsold. The governor was to appoint "three disinterested persons to appraise them" and a register under a bond of ten thousand dollars was appointed to lease them. The leases ran for ninety-nine years, renewable forever, but the law provided that they were to be revalued in 1835 and each twenty years after that date, the rental to be 6 per cent on the appraised value, payable annually.

This principle, with certain changes in details, was adopted the following year, 1817, for the rest of the state,⁶ with the exception of the Western Reserve school lands. Those who held school lands under temporary leases were allowed to obtain permanent leases by making application to the county commissioners in the following manner: they must present, first, a certificate signed by the township trustees that they had complied with their present lease, and, secondly, the consent in writing of the trustees of the organized township and of a majority of the citizens in unorganized townships to the granting of a permanent lease in the place of a temporary one. The land was then appraised by three appraisers appointed by the county commissioners, and the value of all improvements was made a part of the appraised estimate (improvements under temporary leases were a part of the rental paid). The township trustees were then authorized to grant leases for ninety-nine years, renewable forever, at the rate of 6 per cent annually, and with a revaluation each thirty-three years. The same method was followed in the case of unoccupied lands, excepting the provision concerning compliance with the former lease.

In unorganized townships the county commissioners had charge of the leasing, and in the United States Military District the Court of Common Pleas. When land was revalued, it was to be appraised at the rate of unimproved land of the same quality in the vicinity. The appraiser was to consider only the general advance in land prices and not the value that had been added by the labor of the lessee.

Another act passed in 1821¹ directed that land in the United States Military Tract appraised at less than one dollar an acre should not be leased, and confirmed the principle of permanent leasing with minor changes in details of administration. Improvements made by settlers in this district were included in the valuation at the first appraisal after this date, being considered as a part of the rental on the temporary leases held by such settlers. These laws for permanent leasing at no time applied to the school lands belonging to the Western Reserve.

While the general policy of ninety-nine-year leases with a revaluation at stated periods began in the years 1816 and 1817, there had been many individual leases of this type legalized by special legislative action. It was not, therefore, a totally new departure. Prior to 1817 twenty-five local acts had been passed by the legislature legalizing permanent leases for portions of the school land in various localities, and in the leasing of the Ministerial

Lands, Section 29, in the Symmes and Ohio Company Purchases, this plan had been adopted as early as 1806.¹

The first school land to be so leased was the section belonging to the town of Marietta in 1808.² From this time until it became a general policy, the wishes or needs of various communities were met by these special legislative actions. It is interesting to note that in ten of the twenty-five acts so passed the reason assigned is the establishment of a flour mill, sawmill, or similar industry. In these cases Section 16 evidently furnished desirable mill sites and water power, but lessees were unwilling to erect mills, so essential to newly settled communities, without some guaranty of permanence.

In general, the policy of permanent leasing was found undesirable. From the present standpoint it can be seen that if it had been persisted in, and the leasing and revaluation had been carefully managed, it would have preserved to the state a school property of enormous value, which would eventually have produced an income far in excess of the method of selling the lands and funding the proceeds. From the standpoint of the men of that time it was found undesirable because it did not succeed in producing any adequate revenue then for the schools. Land was abundant and cheap. Money for the support of schools was scarce. The state was rapidly filling up,³ but desirable settlers preferred to obtain land in fee simple. It doubtless appeared to those most friendly toward schools and education that it would be more desirable to take advantage of the opportunity to sell, getting the best terms possible and assuring to the schools some definite support from the grant that had been made. Up to this time the actual revenue derived from the lands had been very small.⁴

Caleb Atwater, of Cincinnati, a warm friend of the schools, as chairman of a committee in the Lower House, said in a report to the Assembly in 1822:

From all the committee have been able to learn it would seem⁵ that more money has been expended by the state in legislating concerning these lands than they have yet or ever will produce, unless some other method of managing them

³ See p. 4.

⁴ Atwater, speaking of the first eighteen years of the state's history, said: "Scarcely a dollar was ever paid over to the people for whose benefit the land had been given" (Atwater, A History of the State of Ohio, Natural and Civil, p. 253).

be devised than any hitherto pursued. . . . The committee are impressed with the belief that unless these lands are soon sold . . . no good and much evil will accrue to the state from the grant of these lands by Congress.

He was not alone in his opinion. A memorial addressed to Congress by the General Assembly in the same year,¹ speaking of school lands in general in the West, said that these lands had as yet been very unproductive, and while the legislatures of the states in which they are situated are restricted by the conditions attached to these grants they must ever be so. Indeed, it may well be doubted whether more money has not been spent than the whole amount derived from the lands.

The legislature at this session was evidently impressed by Atwater's report and convinced that the policy of leasing under any of the plans tried was a failure. The lands belonging to the Western Reserve were still being leased on temporary leases with a maximum of fifteen years' duration. Throughout the rest of the state the policy of permanent leasing was the authorized method.

The unleased lands belonging to the Western Reserve were first withdrawn from leasing. This act, passed January 21, 1822,² forbade any further leasing of unoccupied lands, and allowed occupied lands to be released not longer than to April 1, 1826. The following year, January 27, 1823,³ the legislature authorized the surrender of leases for school lands throughout the entire state, and forbade the granting of any new leases for a period of one year. The intent of this law was evidently not to compel a surrender of leases, but to provide a way in which they might be legally terminated at the desire of the lessee, with a prospect of sale in fee simple at some future time.

This same act directed the various county auditors and the register of school lands in the United States Military District to make a complete report to the auditor of state showing "the whole amount of school lands in each county, what proportion is leased, what is vacant, how the lands are divided, distinguishing each tract by the number of acres, range, township, section and quarter, showing what parts are leased, what rent is reserved on each tract leased, how long the lease is to run, whether renewable, and if so, whether subject to reappraisement."

It is evident that neither the legislature nor any state officer knew just what the situation was in regard to school lands throughout the state. This lack of information was the natural result of the various policies adopted for handling the lands. In organized townships the township trustees were in charge of the leasing and in unorganized townships, the county commissioners. In the United States Military District the Court of Common Pleas supervised the leasing of both the lands reserved for that district and those belonging to the Western Reserve, while in the Virginia Military District a land officer, appointed by the General Assembly, was in charge. There was no central office or body which had general supervision except the legislature itself. This body now felt the necessity of a general change of policy, but found that it lacked information as to what had already been done.

The cessation of leasing and the acquiring of the information desired prepared the way for this general change in policy. It was felt that more advantageous results could be obtained by selling the lands outright, but there was doubt in the minds of the legislators as to the authority of the state to permit the lands to be disposed of in this way. By the terms of the original grant, the lands had been set aside for the use of schools in the particular townships and districts forever. While the general management of the trust was vested in the legislature, it seemed doubtful if actual alienation of the lands was originally contemplated, even though the funds should be permanently invested for the use of schools.

In 1824,¹ a carefully phrased memorial was submitted to Congress, asking, first, for an additional grant of land for the use of schools in the Western Reserve,² and, secondly, that Congress confirm the right of the state of Ohio to sell the school lands. As an indication of the sentiment of the time it is an interesting document. It shows, first, that the general attitude of the state toward the grant from the United States was that the lands had been ceded by the United States in return for certain concessions made by Ohio, and, secondly, the difficulties that inhered in the attempt to derive a revenue from the lands themselves. The memorial argues that the original grants were in the nature of a compact made with the state and were "granted upon full consideration arising from the increased value of the remaining lands belonging to the United States and also from the relinquishment, on the part of the state of Ohio, of the right to tax the lands of the United States within the state of Ohio until five years after the sale thereof"; "that it was the intention of the parties to the compact aforesaid that one thirty-sixth part of all the lands within the state of Ohio should be granted to the people thereof for the use of common schools, and should be placed under the control of the legislature," and that the state is of right entitled to the additional grant for the Western Reserve.

² When the original grant was made for the Western Reserve, no lands were set aside for the use of schools in the lands then held by the Indian tribes within the Reserve. When the Indian title was extinguished, Ohio immediately asked for an additional grant equal to one thirty-sixth part of the land so held. This grant was finally made by Congress in 1834. (U.S. Statutes at Large, Vol. IV, 679.)

The memorial goes on to say that, in relation to the lands already appropriated, the legislature has "resorted to various methods of rendering them productive, and, in particular, that of leasing them to such individuals as have applied therefor; that experience has fully demonstrated that this fund will be wholly unavailing in their hands in its present shape"; that to accomplish the objects contemplated "the legislature should possess unlimited control over the lands" with the power of disposing of them in fee.

"The objections which are urged against the present mode of administering that fund are in the first place that by reason of the facilities which the state of Ohio affords for acquiring property in real estate, a necessity exists of leasing the lands to persons almost destitute of pecuniary means whereby the avails of these lands are rendered, at least, uncertain. In consequence also, that as these lands are detached over the whole of the state of Ohio, the expense which must necessarily be incurred by creating a superintendence over them renders them less productive than your memorialists conceive they might be rendered if the lands were sold and the proceeds concentrated in one fund."

"The fact, also, before adverted to, that these lands must necessarily be entrusted to the possession of those of the lowest class of the community, and who possess no permanent interest in the soil, has produced a waste upon these lands of their timber and otherwise, equal perhaps to the whole revenue which may have been derived from them."

The memorial recites further that the method of leasing "will invite and retain a population within her boundaries of a character not to be desired and in amount so great as to create an evil which can only be conceived of in a country where every individual possessing a very moderate portion of industry and economy may, within a single year, appropriate to himself in fee a quantity of land sufficient to furnish means of support for an ordinary family."

The memorial continues by saying "that these evils arise wholly from the system of granting leases and are such as cannot be remedied by legislative action, if, as some have supposed, the state have not the power, under the terms of the original grant, of disposing of these lands in fee." The memorialists believe that the state has the right, but "they are of the opinion that an act of the Congress of the United States declaratory of the extent of the grant aforesaid will be productive of much benefit in case the legislature of the state should hereafter determine to dispose of the same; that it will have the full effect of removing the doubt in the minds of the purchasers and thereby enhance the price which will be obtained for the same."

They therefore asked Congress to grant them the right to dispose of the lands in fee, the proceeds to be invested in a permanent fund, the income of which should be applied for the use of common schools in the townships or districts to which the lands were originally granted, provided that Section 16 should not be sold without the consent of the inhabitants of the township to which the land belonged.

Congress passed the desired legislation February 1, 1826,¹ and on January 27, 1827,² the legislature passed an act directing each township in the state possessing school land to vote upon the question of its sale, and also authorizing the inhabitants of the United States Military District³ and the Virginia Military District⁴ to decide the same question. Legislation authorizing a vote on the Western Reserve⁵ was not passed until the following year.

In the meantime the policy of special legislation to meet local needs had continued. From 1817 to 1823,⁶ the period of permanent leasing, twenty-one local acts had been passed making special provisions for leasing or extending the time for making payments on leases, and from 1823 to 1827 eleven more acts were passed authorizing the revaluation of lands leased, changing the conditions for lessees, or authorizing short-time leases, etc.

The general policy inaugurated by the legislation of 1827 and 1828 remained the policy of the state until 1850, though certain changes were made correcting some of the more undesirable features.

The legislation of 1827 provided that the townships or districts interested should decide upon the sale of their school lands and described the method by which the sale was to be made in case the vote was favorable. It did not actually authorize the sale. This was to be done after the vote was taken by additional acts of the legislature, or in the case of the United States Military District by proclamation of the governor. The provisions governing the sale were as follows: Land that was unoccupied was to be appraised by the county assessor. The land was then advertised and offered for sale to the highest bidder by the county auditor. No bid could be received for less than appraised value. Payments were made to the county treasurer, and the money received by him was deposited with the state treasurer to the credit of the township or district to which it had belonged. When the money was all paid, the purchaser received a deed from the state.

It was in the legislation concerning the occupied lands that the greatest loss occurred to the state. Holders of permanent leases were allowed to surrender their leases, and by the payment of the appraised value upon which it had been originally leased receive a deed in fee simple. The terms of payment were easy, running over periods of seven to ten years, and by subsequent legislation further extended in many cases.

The following year, 1828,¹ the legislature authorized sales to be made in thirty-nine counties in which the vote had been favorable. From this time until 1850 there was a constant succession of local acts authorizing sales in various townships and counties; making provisions for leasing lands where the assent was not given to the sale; authorizing revaluation of lands where lessees thought the original valuation was too high, or the townships considered it too low; giving additional time in which to make the payments due; and in general enacting various laws that had only local application. Between 1827 and 1850 approximately four hundred such acts were passed. In 1828¹ those townships that had not voted to sell their school lands were authorized to lease it for periods of not less than three years for improved lands nor seven years for unimproved lands. In case the consent of the townships had been given and the lands remained unsold, they might be leased from year to year on the best terms obtainable. The entire arrangement and responsibility were placed in the hands of the township trustees. In 1838,² largely through the influence of Samuel Lewis, the state superintendent of schools, the practice of allowing the holders of permanent leases to surrender their leases, and, by payment of the first appraised value, receive a deed in fee simple, was stopped, and by an act of 1843³ such surrender was authorized only upon the land being reappraised and the amount of its new valuation paid. From 1839⁴ on it was a common practice to include a minimum price below which the land could not be sold, and in 1845⁵ a general act was passed forbidding the sale of any school land in the state for less than five dollars an acre. This act of 1845 is the last important school land legislation during the period 1803–1850.

SUMMARY

The first attempt of the legislature was to preserve the lands and make them productive through a system of short-term leases which provided for the payment of rents through improvements made upon the lands. This system was followed until 1817 with the exception of the land belonging to the Virginia Military District.

The system of temporary leasing was found unsatisfactory, and in 1817 the state embarked on the policy of authorizing permanent leases with a revaluation of lands at periods of thirty to thirty-five years. This system also proved unsatisfactory in practice.

From 1827 on the state legalized the sale of school lands in fee simple, but allowed the local community to decide whether the lands should be sold, and in case they were not, the management was left in the hands of the township trustees, with certain limitations as to the length of time for which leases might be granted. The money from lands sold was paid through the county treasurer's office into the office of the state treasurer and placed at the disposal of the state, the state pledging itself to pay a 6 per cent annual interest upon the moneys so deposited for the use of the schools of the township or territory to which the land had belonged. The revenue from leased land was handled directly by the township trustees and apportioned among the school districts of the townships. The basis of apportionment in each case was the number of white unmarried youth between the ages of four and twenty-one. During the whole period the legislature heeded local needs and wishes through local and special legislation.

The results of the system, or lack of system, entailed great loss. This loss was not due primarily to the leasing of the lands or the selling of them, but to the fact that the state had no central office whose business it was to oversee the lands and know exactly what the conditions were in regard to them, and to see that the laws in force were obeyed. The legislature was a changing body. It lacked necessary information for intelligent action in many cases, and it attempted to meet local conditions without complete knowledge of the facts.

The chief specific points in the general policy that resulted in loss were:

First, that of allowing permanent lessees whose lands had been appraised during the period from 1817 to 1823¹ to surrender their leases and obtain deeds by paying the original appraisal value. This policy was followed until 1838.

Secondly,² the policy of local appraisal. This might or might not work well. It depended wholly on the appraisers chosen. It was found necessary to forbid by law any appraiser purchasing land.

Thirdly, that no minimum price was placed upon the school lands until 1845.³

Fourthly, the policy of local control in leasing and of special or local legislation. Where the school sentiment was high this might work well, but where it was low the results were likely to be disastrous.

¹ "Cases have come to my knowledge where land has been taken at six dollars per acre worth at the time fifty dollars. . . . The tenants to be sure make their fortunes, but the schools are sacrificed" (Ohio Documents, 36th G. A., Doc. 17, p. 41).

² "In one very aggravated case the assessor was a lessee on the land" (ibid., Doc. 17, p. 41).

³ "It is not uncommon to find land sold for fifty, forty, thirty, twenty, ten, and in one case, as low as five cents per acre. Men have become the purchasers of whole sections for a mere trifle, and that sometimes where it only required a few years to have realized five, ten, fifteen or twenty dollars per acre" (Third Annual Report of the Superintendent of the Common Schools, made to the Thirty-eighth General Assembly of the State of Ohio, p. 58).

The state lacked any settled, clearly defined policy, and it lacked administrative machinery to oversee the policies that were initiated. The legislators, in general, were doubtless honest in their efforts, but they were in session but a few weeks each year and then were engaged on all classes of legislation. It was only as one had opportunity to study the question in detail and in its bearing upon the state as a whole, and to carry on this work for a period of years, that a basis could be afforded for intelligent action. Samuel Lewis was enabled to give a portion of his time to this work in the three years from 1837 to 1840, and the legislation resulting saved thousands of dollars for the schools.

A quotation from the report of John Brough, auditor of state in 1839 and 1840, furnishes a fitting conclusion to this summary. Mr. Brough had previously been a member of the legislature and as a member was evidently satisfied that the general policy followed by the legislature was desirable. The quotation shows the change in his opinion when, as auditor of state, he gave the question careful study.

One of the most important items of state policy, and one which it is feared has been least investigated and understood, is the prudent management and judicious disposition of our school lands. Through the indefatigable labor of the state superintendent, public attention has been fully aroused to the waste that has been committed in this property, and a determination instilled to place additional guards upon the future. That determination cannot be too carefully cherished or rigidly adhered to. The investigations imposed by the ordinary discharge of public duty have thrown a light and sealed a conviction upon my own mind, at variance with my former opinions, which had been conceived upon a superficial knowledge of the subject;—and such will be the effect upon the mind of every one who will seek the records and gather the melancholy information they contain. Our school fund this year, arising from interest on sales of lands, and subject to distribution among the counties, is $73,618.78; and to accumulate this, we have sacrificed lands, which, if they had been judiciously held and managed, would have now given us at least ten times that amount and constituted a revenue sufficient to educate every child in the state.¹

CHAPTER IV

SECONDARY AND HIGHER EDUCATION

SECONDARY EDUCATION

The legislation concerning secondary education in Ohio prior to 1850 deals wholly with the incorporation of private secondary institutions, except in the case of a few city or town charters in the last few years of this period, which make provision for schools of "a higher grade" or for high schools.

The state did not concern itself with secondary schools except to indicate the manner in which they might be incorporated and in placing certain limits upon their activities and upon the amount of property they might hold. Here again the principle was that of local initiative with the state willing to encourage local effort by legally recognizing the school established, but taking no responsibility or initiative for establishing, supporting, or controlling such schools.

The constitution declared that every association of persons having given themselves a name might, on application to the legislature, be entitled to receive letters of incorporation to enable them to hold estates for the support of their schools, academies, colleges, universities, and for other purposes.¹ When the legislature had granted the act of incorporation provided for, it considered its whole duty in the matter at an end. The idea of a free system of common schools gradually developed during the period and the conception of state-wide taxation for at least their partial support appears as early as 1825, but at no time prior to 1850 does the legislation show any conception of a state system of education embracing elementary, secondary, and higher education. Secondary education was for those communities that wanted and could afford to pay for it.

Mr. Lewis in his second report in 1838 had clearly in mind the beginnings of a state secondary system. He did not, however, advocate legislation that would in any way compel the state to take a part in the establishment of secondary schools, but rather a law that would allow individual townships to establish such schools and support them from public funds, with the method of establishment and support warranted by the law of the state.

His advice to the legislature on the subject was as follows:

There are some townships that have the means and the desire of establishing central township schools or academies, and in most of our townships the youth over twelve years of age could with convenience attend such a school. The number of townships now prepared for this measure is small, but will be increasing. I recommend, therefore, a provision giving the whole number of directors in the township authority to establish a school, and assess upon the township such sum of money as may be required for that purpose, and to this end they should from their own number appoint a board of five, who should for the time being control such central school.

The mere passage of the law could do no harm to those townships who would refuse to avail themselves of its provisions, and would give to those desiring the privilege, the right to exercise it.¹

No action was taken upon this recommendation, and no general legislation concerning secondary education was enacted prior to 1850. Some city charters made provision for schools above the elementary, but the state did not concern itself with secondary education as a recognized part of the public-school system.

The usual type of secondary institution receiving letters of incorporation was an academy supported by a stock company, with shares selling for from five to fifty dollars each. A community that wished an education for its children beyond the three R's of the common school subscribed stock for the purpose of building and equipping a school of higher grade. The management was ordinarily in the hands of a board of trustees elected by the stockholders. In most cases the articles of incorporation do not mention tuition or rates, but in some cases it is specifically stated² that the running expense of the school shall be assessed upon the parents in proportion to the number of children attending, and doubtless in all cases tuition was charged. Occasionally the trustees are authorized to set apart a fund for the education of poor children.³ A school of this type was usually called an academy; less frequently the terms "institute" and "seminary" appeared. The names "seminary" and "institute" are not used, with one or two exceptions, until after 1830. The name "high school" appears at this same period and is used occasionally to designate a school of this same general type of organization, supported by an association of subscribers, who formed a stock company to raise the funds for the establishment or support of the school. The first high school chartered in Ohio was The High School of Elyria, February 22, 1830,¹ followed the next year by the Woodward High School of Cincinnati.² The latter institution had been incorporated as the "Free Grammar School" as early as 1827,³ but its earlier function was declared to be the "better instruction of the poor children" "in the rudiments of an English education." By the terms of the incorporation the trustees were directed to confine instruction to "the common and necessary branches of an English education" and not to extend it to the higher branches of such an education until the funds were sufficient to provide for all the poor children in the city.

The total number of secondary schools incorporated from 1803 to 1850 was 172, classed as follows:

The names of these schools and the dates of their incorporation arranged in chronological order are shown on pages 78-83 and their location is shown on the map that accompanies this list. The Erie Literary Society, located at Burton, on the Western Reserve, leads the list in 1803, followed by academies in Dayton, Worthington, and Chillicothe in 1808.

The Western Reserve far outstrips any other section of the state in the number of these institutions, having more than three times as many as any other section. The map shows, however, that with the exception of the western portion of the state, where the settlements were much later, these schools were fairly abundant in all parts of Ohio.

The ambitious boy or girl had before him the incentive to a higher education than the common schools afforded and the possibility of attaining it without going to any great distance. The omnipresence of the Ohio man later in our country's history may be in no small part accounted for by the omnipresence of the Ohio academy and college.

The list given and the institutions located on the map by no means give all schools of this type founded before 1850. Only those that received articles of incorporation from the state legislature are here shown.

There were also incorporated during the same period twenty-three school or education societies whose purpose was to found academies or other schools, or in some way offer better educational facilities to the communities interested.

The denominational influence does not seem to have been great in founding these secondary schools. Some twenty-one of the schools and societies are more or less denominational in control or in sympathy, as indicated by the act of incorporation or the name. In six cases the Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church either appointed the trustees or had some part in the appointment of them. The other schools and societies that show denominational influence are scattered among the Presbyterian, Baptist, Catholic, German Lutheran, and Quaker sects. It is true that prior to 1836 there were also eighty-four church incorporations in which the churches were given a right to maintain a school by the articles of incorporation. The usual form in which this was done was by limiting the use of funds to the support of a church "and to any institution of charity or education connected therewith." In 1836¹ a general law was passed which gave any religious society incorporating after that date the right to apply property not exceeding an annual value of one thousand dollars to the support of public worship and such institutions of learning and charity as might be connected with such society. How far the rights thus extended were used by the churches to found schools of secondary grade the laws themselves give no hint. Only a careful search of church records could do this. It is probable, however, that a secondary school of any importance would have followed the custom of the time and sought independent incorporation. The financial limitations both in special and in general acts would have prevented an extensive educational institution.

The comparatively small denominational influence exerted on secondary schools was not due to any lack of religious or sectarian interest. Numerous sects and varied religious beliefs² were common, but this very multiplicity was a source of religious toleration, and in the founding of schools for the children of the community a common interest was found, in support of which the adherents of creeds that were not too divergent often united.

There are frequent indications in the articles of incorporation of an effort to keep the schools free from any cause of religious controversy. Sections appear prohibiting the introduction or teaching of any religious tenets peculiar to any Christian sect.¹ Sometimes there is recognition of the fact that there are other possible causes of dissension, as when a clause appears providing that "no political, religious, moral or literary association shall have an ascendancy in the directory."²

The curriculum was not usually specified in the articles of incorporation, but was frequently hinted at in the right given to the trustees to determine what branches of the "arts and sciences" should be taught, or sometimes the phrase ran "learned languages, arts and sciences," or branches of a "polite and liberal education."

The manual labor influence first appeared in 1834 with the incorporation of Stephen Strong's Manual Labor Seminary.³ The Ashtabula Institution of Science and Industry had been founded as early as 1831,⁴ but in 1835⁵ the name was changed to the Grand River Institute, and there is nothing but the earlier name to indicate anything other than the ordinary secondary institution. The name of Pestalozzi's one-time associate, Fellenberg, was doubtless in the minds of the incorporators of the Fellenburgh Institute in Medina County in 1835,⁶ though no mention is made of manual labor in the articles of incorporation. There are only four other secondary institutions whose articles of incorporation make any mention of this phase of education.⁷ One of these, Bishop's Fraternal Calvinistic [sic] Seminary, chartered in 1835, specifies that there shall be manual labor for both males and females.⁸

The only control the state exercised over these institutions was in limiting the amount of property they might hold, the amount of the annual income, or the amount of stock that might be issued. It was also common to find an express stipulation forbidding an incorporated company of this character to engage in the banking business or to issue any medium of exchange. The legislature, too, commonly reserved the right to alter the articles of incorporation at any time, and in 1839¹ a general act was passed to regulate incorporated literary societies, which included all associations for literary purposes except common schools, colleges, and universities. The first general provision of this kind was enacted as early as 1817, in a rather cumbersome act "to provide for the incorporation of schools and library companies."² By the terms of this law the association that wished to incorporate submitted the articles they had prepared to the "President of the court of common pleas," in the circuit in which the association was to be established. If the "president" approved, he indorsed the same and submitted them to the inspection of two judges of the supreme court. They were then examined by these judges and, if found conformable to the provisions of the law, were approved and indorsed, and deposited with the recorder of the county in which the association was located.

This procedure established the association as a body politic and corporate under the laws of the state. It seems to have been from the first a dead letter, although not formally repealed. It was the first general law of the Ohio legislature that had primary reference to education, or educational institutions, and is of interest for this reason.

By the provisions of the act of 1839 the capital stock and property of academies could not exceed forty thousand dollars, unless increased in the act of incorporation. The act also stated that no part of the funds of such an institution should ever be used for banking, nor should certificates of deposit or drafts which in any manner could be used as a circulating medium be issued. From this time on, too, the directors or trustees were held individually liable for all debts of the association. There was no thought of state supervision or control of these institutions until 1838,³ and then only to see that funds given were being used for the purpose for which they were donated. The law at that time directed the state superintendent to collect information concerning all funds and property given in any way for education, except in the case of chartered colleges, and allowed him to direct procedure against the corporation by the local prosecuting attorney in case any misapplication of funds appeared.

HIGHER EDUCATION

UNIVERSITIES, COLLEGES, AND THEOLOGICAL INSTITUTIONS

A large number of institutions of higher learning were incorporated during this period of Ohio's history, the total number of such incorporations before 1850 being forty-four. Among these are a number which are still in existence, including some of the best known institutions in the state. In the period from 1803 to 1810 the Ohio University, 1804, originally chartered in 1802; Cincinnati University, 1807, and Miami University, 1809, were founded. Between 1821 and 1830 Kenyon College, 1824; Western Reserve University, 1826; Lane Seminary, 1829, were incorporated; followed in the period from 1831 to 1840 by Denison University, 1832; Marietta College, 1832; Oberlin College, 1834, and Muskingum College, 1837; while in the last ten years from 1841 to 1850 Wesleyan University, 1842; Wittenberg College, 1845; Otterbein University, 1849; Capital University, 1850; Urbana University, 1850, and Hiram College, 1850, appeared.

A number of these institutions were not incorporated under the names which they now bear. Ohio University was originally incorporated during the territorial period as the American Western University.¹ Kenyon College first appeared as the Theological Seminary of the Protestant Episcopal Church,² Western Reserve University as Western Reserve College,³ Denison University as the Granville Literary and Theological Institution,⁴ Marietta College as the Marietta Collegiate Institute and Western Teachers' Seminary,⁵ Oberlin College as the Oberlin Collegiate Institute,⁶ and Hiram College as the Western Reserve Eclectic Institute.⁷ In a few cases academies or other secondary schools were later given the right to confer collegiate degrees,⁸ while in some instances institutions incorporated as colleges or universities were doubtless, in fact, secondary in character, and in other cases were never actually founded, the act of incorporation representing only the purpose and ideals of the incorporators.

State influence on higher education.—The attitude of the state toward higher education as toward secondary education was marked by a willingness to legalize by incorporation the educational aspirations of any group of people, while taking on itself a minimum amount of responsibility for the resulting institution either through support or control.

Three townships had been set aside for the support of higher institutions of learning, two in the Ohio Company's Purchase¹ and one in the John Cleve Symmes Purchase.² The Ohio University at Athens and the Miami University at Oxford grew out of these two grants. These two institutions were under limited state control. The General Assembly appointed their trustees, determined by legal enactment the manner in which their lands were to be disposed of, and in the acts of incorporation laid down certain regulations, but in no real sense did the state in this period assume any responsibility for them.

Ohio University.—On December 18, 1799,³ the territorial legislature, by resolution, requested Rufus Putnam, with two associates, to lay off in the college townships (Townships 8 and 9 in Washington County) a town plat with a square for the colleges and lots for the president and professors, "bordering on or encircled by spacious commons." The following year the report of "said Putnam" was accepted, and the town of Athens established,⁴ and on January 9, 1802,⁵ the university was incorporated under the name of the American Western University, with Rufus Putnam and Return Jonathan Meigs, afterward governor of Ohio and Postmaster-General of the United States, as members of the first Board of Trustees.

In 1803 Ohio was admitted as a state, and at the second session of the legislature, February 18, 1804,⁶ a second act of incorporation was passed, in which the name was changed to "Ohio University." A board of twelve trustees, exclusive of the governor of the state and the president of the university, ex-officio members, was appointed, and power was given to them to appoint teachers and officers. Vacancies in the board could be filled temporarily by the board itself until appointments by the legislature at its next session.

The faculty was directed to report to the corporation "from time to time" and to hold public examinations of the students of each class quarterly. Two townships were set aside "for the sole use, benefit and support of the state university forever," and directions were given for laying off, appraising, and leasing the lands. This latter provision directed that the land should be leased on ninety-year liens, renewable forever with an annual rental of 6 per cent, revaluation at thirty-five and sixty years, and another revaluation at the end of the ninety-year period. All the land in the two townships, together with the buildings, was exempted from all state taxes.

The statement given above includes all the points in which the state exercised any control. It appointed the trustees, it directed the faculty to report "from time to time" to the trustees, it directed that quarterly examinations of the students should be held, and it specified how the land granted for the use of the university was to be leased.

The next year¹ the legislature changed the form of the lease to ninety-nine-year leases, renewable forever, omitting the clause calling for a revaluation, and forbade the leasing of any land at less than one dollar and seventy-five cents per acre, but in 1807² the trustees were authorized to lease the land that had been appraised at less than one dollar and seventy-five cents at its appraised value.

The legislation of the next ten years is concerned only with different phases of leasing of the land and the appointment of trustees, but in 1817,³ an act was passed authorizing a lottery to raise the sum of twenty thousand dollars "to defray the expense of completing the college edifice lately erected at Athens, and to purchase a library and suitable mathematical and philosophical apparatus for the use of Ohio University." On February 1, 1825,⁴ an appropriation of one thousand dollars was made for the purpose of paying debts and purchasing philosophical apparatus. In 1826,⁵ during the same period in which the sale of school lands was begun,

⁴ O.L., XXIII, 19.

⁵ O.L., XXIV, 52.

the trustees were authorized to sell the remaining lands in the college townships which were not encumbered by leases, and to convey title in fee simple to lessees who paid a sum which would yield at 6 per cent a revenue equal to the yearly rental. The money received from such sales was to be deposited with the state treasurer, and the state pledged itself to pay 6 per cent on the sums so deposited and reserved the right to repay the money at any time.¹

In 1836² and again in 1837³ the legislature passed resolutions demanding reports from the university, particularly as to the expenditures and receipts, and in the second resolution asking for the number of professors engaged, the branches of literature and science taught by each, and a list of the number of students of each year from 1826 to 1837. In 1838⁴ the commissioners of the Canal Fund were authorized to loan five thousand dollars to the university to be paid back in annual instalments of one thousand dollars each, with interest at 6 per cent, and in 1847⁵ the president and trustees were authorized to fund the debts of the university in an amount not to exceed ten thousand dollars, and the debt so funded was exempt from taxation.

In 1843⁶ the legislature passed an act declaring that it was the true intent of the law passed in 1805, authorizing ninety-nine-year leases, that the land should never be revalued. This meant a great annual loss to the university, as the lands were originally appraised and leased at a low valuation and rental, and by this act the rental could never be increased. The Supreme Court of the state had already passed on this question and had decided that the lands were legally subject to reappraisal. The act of 1843 was passed to nullify that decision.⁷

These chief points in the legislation concerning Ohio University in the period from 1803 to 1850 show how little there was of either state aid or state direction. One appropriation of one thousand dollars, authority to raise twenty thousand dollars by means of a lottery, a loan of five thousand dollars, and the privilege of funding a debt of ten thousand dollars without taxation, and the exemption of the lands in the college townships from state taxation comprise all the assistance of a financial nature given by the state.

The appointment of trustees, the requirement of a report asked for twice, and certain general requirements specified in the charter include all of the control or guidance on the educational side. It is evident that the institution was not regarded in any true sense as a state university, if by that term is meant an institution supported by the state and governed by policies of state initiation. If further evidence were needed, it is found in a memorial addressed to Congress by the legislature in 1829,¹ asking Congress to grant two townships of land for the support of colleges and universities. The memorial states that Ohio "has no adequate means of creating and fostering scientific institutions without resorting to the odious measure of direct taxation." "Possessing no national domains and having amongst its citizens few or none whose love of literature would prompt at the same time their wealth would make them able, to endow public seminaries of learning. . . . the interests of science must be neglected and languish, unless aid can be obtained in the mode now proposed."

"Ohio has received no grant of this character, unless the land included in the Ohio Company's Purchase and Symmes' Purchase should be so considered, but neither the state nor the inhabitants of those districts have ever thus regarded them." They were intended to be for the special benefit of the inhabitants of those districts, and the location of the seminaries was confined to them.

Miami University.—The legislation concerning Miami University is of the same general type. The college township was located in 1803² and the university incorporated in 1809.³ By the act of incorporation all benefits and advantages were to be open to all citizens of the state. A board of twelve trustees was appointed, and the faculty was directed to hold at least once in every year a public examination of the students in each class. Succeeding legislation was concerned only with the appointment of trustees, the leasing of college lands, and the collecting of rents, with the exception of an act in 1814⁴ which required the trustees to make an accurate statement of all proceedings "both as respects the

³ O.L., VII, 184.

disposal of land, as well as the state of the funds arising from the proceeds," to the legislature. There seems to have been no financial aid of any kind extended to Miami University prior to 1850, and, as in the case of Ohio University, no control or initiation of educational policies. The state for the first time shows an awakening responsibility in 1849¹ by the appointment of a committee of three "to examine into and report to the next General Assembly the condition of the Miami University and the cause of its decline, with such recommendations as they may deem proper to make."

Other institutions.—A grant of five hundred dollars each was made to two other institutions by the legislature by an act passed in 1836.² The two institutions receiving this aid were the College of Ripley in Brown County and Franklin College in Harrison County. The act of incorporation for the College of Ripley³ specified that vacancies in the Board of Trustees were to be filled by the General Assembly. Aside from this, these two institutions seem in no way to differ from others founded during the same period. The appropriation made was evidently incidental and due to local influence, and did not indicate any general policy of state aid. It is also an indication that the state regarded other institutions in about the same way that it regarded Ohio and Miami universities.

In 1828⁴ the legislature warmly seconded the efforts of Philander Chase, the president of Kenyon College, in his attempt to obtain a grant of lands from Congress for the support of that institution, and requested its senators and representatives to use their efforts in Congress to support such legislation. These instances include all of the state's activities in the interests of higher education.

In the case of other institutions chartered, the state exercised no control, except that it became customary after 1830 to specify in the incorporating act that the right to amend or alter the charter was reserved by the legislature. There also appeared frequent limitations as to the amount of real property that might be held, or the annual income that might be derived from it.

Denominational influences.—It is impossible to say from a study of the acts of incorporation how far denominational influence was instrumental in the founding of the large number of colleges and

² O.L., XXXIV, local, 610.

³ O.L., XXVIII, local, 88.

⁴ O.L., XXVI, local, 176.

universities that appeared during this period. It was certainly much more influential than in the case of secondary institutions. Twenty-one of the forty-four schools show evidence of denominational influence either in the act itself or in the name given, while a few of them had from the first the preparation of ministers for a particular sect in mind. It is quite probable that others were under denominational influence where nothing in the charter or name indicates it.

Agricultural schools.—It is interesting to note that as early as 1846¹ a Farmers' College was incorporated in Hamilton County, whose purpose was declared to be "to direct and cultivate the minds of the students in a thorough and scientific course of studies particularly adapted to agricultural pursuits." This institution was the result of private initiative and was founded by a stock company.

Summary.—The period was one of activity and interest in higher education with a determined effort to afford the advantages of college and university training to the young people of the state without the necessity of going beyond the state border for it. The state's attitude was shown in its willingness to assist through legalizing such efforts by acts of incorporation, but with no conception of any adequate responsibility in the matter, even for those institutions which might naturally have been considered state foundations.

MEDICAL EDUCATION

During the first eight years of the state's history there was no legislation that bore in any way upon medical practice or indicated any state requirements for entering the profession. In 1811² an act was passed to regulate the practice of physic and surgery. The state was divided into five medical districts each having three medical censors or examiners, and it was made obligatory upon anyone who wished to practice medicine as a means of livelihood to obtain a license from one of these boards of examiners. The qualifications for a license included satisfactory evidence that the candidate was of good moral character, and that he had attended three full years to the theory and practice of medicine under the guidance of some able physician or surgeon, or that he had a license from some medical society showing that he had been admitted as a practitioner. He was also required to give satisfactory answers to such questions as might be put to him by the examiners in "Anatomy, Materia Medica, Chymistry, and the Theory and Practice of Physic."

In 1812¹ a medical society was incorporated, the state divided into seven medical districts, and the society given power to appoint examining committees to examine and license candidates and also to grant honorary degrees to such of the faculty as they might find of distinguished merit. Practicing without a license from some medical society or college of physicians was forbidden, and a penalty from five to one hundred dollars was imposed for each offense.

In 1817² the candidate was required, in addition to the examination, to deliver a thesis upon some medical subject, and in 1818³ those who had received the degree of Doctor of Medicine in any university or other medical institution within the United States were exempted from the necessity of being examined for a license.

In 1819⁴ the first medical school in the state was incorporated in Cincinnati under the name of the Medical College of Ohio. The preamble recites that the students of medicine in Ohio are so distant from any well-regulated college as to labor under serious disadvantages in the prosecution of their studies. The purpose of the college was to give instruction in physic and surgery and the auxiliary sciences. There were four incorporators, and the act of incorporation evidently followed the desires of those responsible for the institution. Six professorships were created, and the subjects of instruction of each were indicated. The state very early assumed a certain amount of control of this institution, at first indirectly, through authorizing⁵ the State Medical Convention to appoint two delegates annually to attend the commencement of the medical college, take part in the examination, vote on the candidates, and sign diplomas on behalf of the convention. This Medical Convention consisted of delegates from the various medical districts in the state, and was given at the same time (1821)⁶ the exclusive right to grant licenses for practice. It was allowed to select each year two indigent medical students and recommend them to the Medical College, whose duty it was to give them instruction gratuitously.

In 1822¹ on recommendation of the Medical Convention, a board of thirteen trustees of the college was appointed by the General Assembly, and they were given general control of the institution, and it was provided that from this time the trustees were to be so appointed.

In 1825² the legislature directed that the moneys raised by auction fees in Hamilton County should be appropriated for four years to the use of the Medical College, unless otherwise directed by the General Assembly.³ This was extended to five years at the next meeting of the legislature, and in 1831⁴ one-fourth of the money from the same source was appropriated for five years, not, however, to exceed twenty thousand dollars for the period. In 1838⁵ there were fifteen hundred dollars appropriated outright from the state treasury to be applied to liquidate any unsatisfied claims against the school.

There were no other provisions for financial aid, but in 1833⁶ the medical examiners were allowed to appoint one indigent student from each medical district for free instruction, and on the same date the governor was requested to appoint a committee of five to investigate the organization, government, and condition of the Medical College, and to report to the General Assembly, suggesting "the proper means of advancing the prosperity and utility of the state medical college as an institution of the state, and of medical science therein."

For the first thirty-five years there was no medical institution incorporated in any of the other cities of the state. Two other institutions were chartered in Cincinnati in 1828,⁷ the Western Eye and Ear Infirmary, whose trustees had power to appoint "surgeons, advising physicians, lecturers, and teachers," and the Cincinnati Medical Academy,⁸ designed to give a systematic course preparatory to admission to a medical college.

From 1839 to 1850 eight other institutions were chartered in the state for various types of medical instruction. There were also incorporated nine local and county medical societies, evidently associations of physicians organized for the advancement of medical science. The State Medical Society was incorporated in 1848¹ with power to organize auxiliary societies. The state took no part in the control or support of the later institutions incorporated.

LEGAL EDUCATION

There is almost no legislation bearing on legal education prior to 1850. In 1819² a law was passed that no person should be licensed to practice as an attorney unless he had studied law attentively for the period of two years previous to his application for a license. In 1846³ appeared the first indication of any definite legal instruction in an act authorizing any male citizen of the state of good moral character to take the oath of office and receive a license to practice on producing to two judges of the Supreme Court a certificate from the law department of the Cincinnati College.

CHAPTER V

THE EDUCATION OF DEFECTIVES, DEPENDENTS, AND DELINQUENTS

The institutions for the education of the deaf and dumb and the blind were definitely recognized as a state responsibility, and ample and intelligent provision was made by the state for children of this class. This conception of the state's responsibility was not recognized at once, however, but was a matter of gradual growth. The deaf and dumb school preceded the school for the blind by ten years, and in the legislation that centers about it the gradual development of the idea of state responsibility for financial support can be seen.

THE EDUCATION OF DEFECTIVES

Education of the deaf and dumb.—In an act passed in 1822¹ the Court of Common Pleas was authorized to appoint guardians for deaf and dumb persons, and the power of the guardians was expressly extended to the protection, education, and maintenance of their wards. In case the guardian or parent was unable to teach such children to read and write, the law permitted the county commissioners, on application, to appropriate money from the county treasury for such instruction. The law was wholly permissive in character and simply legalized appropriations for the instruction of deaf and dumb children in cases in which the county commissioners saw fit to grant aid. By the same law the township officers were required to report to the county auditors the number of deaf and dumb persons in the township, and the auditors were directed to report the results to the state auditor.

This was followed at the next session in 1822² by an act the sole purpose of which was to ascertain the number of deaf and dumb persons in the state. Five years later, in 1827,³ an act was passed to incorporate the "Trustees of the Ohio Asylum for Educating the Deaf and Dumb." Eight trustees were named in the act of incorporation, and they were authorized to receive gifts and bequests for the purpose of educating the deaf and dumb, and were directed to report to the next General Assembly as to the location of the schools, the kind of buildings needed, with an estimate of expense for buildings and instruction, and a plan for its organization and government. The funds of the institution were to be under the management of the trustees subject to the regulation of the General Assembly, and reports were required annually as to the expenses, number of students, number taught at state expense, and the number who paid tuition, together with general information as to the status of the school.

The trustees were allowed to draw on the treasury of the state for the support of one indigent student from each judicial circuit an amount not to exceed one hundred dollars for any student, and no student was to receive such aid longer than three years. The governor was ex-officio president of the Board of Trustees, and it was specifically stated that the incorporated body was under the control and direction of the General Assembly.

The idea of the legislature seems to have been to organize an institution under state management and control, but financed by private donations, with the state giving a minimum amount to the support of indigent students. The following year, 1828, the first appropriation of state money was made, amounting to $376.76.¹ In 1829² the trustees were authorized to open the asylum in rented houses until suitable buildings were erected, and an additional appropriation of one thousand dollars was made. The same year it was decided to locate the institution permanently in Columbus,³ and the trustees were authorized to receive any donations of land or to purchase a site. In the meanwhile Congress had been urged⁴ to appropriate a township of land, or an amount equivalent to that, located in smaller tracts, to aid in the education of the deaf and dumb. The grant was not made, and in 1830⁵ another appropriation of one thousand dollars was made, and the trustees were again authorized to receive one indigent student from each judicial circuit at state expense, but the amount to be expended was reduced from one hundred dollars to seventy-five dollars for each student.¹ The next year the number of students receiving state aid was increased to two from each circuit,² a total of eighteen, and an appropriation of sixteen hundred dollars³ was made for expenses. This was followed in 1832 by an act appropriating one-fourth of the money arising from sales at auction in Hamilton County⁴ and by another fifteen-hundred-dollar appropriation from the treasury.⁵

The state had not reached a point where it was ready to assume the burden of the school, and it again applied to Congress in the same year⁶ for assistance through a land grant. In this memorial it was estimated that a proper housing and equipment would cost from fifteen thousand to twenty thousand dollars, with a total annual expenditure of nearly ten thousand dollars. It was pointed out that Ohio, in common with many other states, did not possess land of her own which might be appropriated, and that the only resource, unless Congress came to the state's aid, was by drawing from revenue derived by direct taxation for other purposes. The memorial declares that everyone will admit that this measure is impolitic and ought to be avoided, and that it may be deemed quite sufficient to provide in this way for indigent students.⁷

From this time on appropriations of fifteen hundred to three thousand dollars were common until 1846,⁸ when a systematic budget was evidently adopted and regular appropriations made to meet it. The appropriation for expenses in this year amounted to nine thousand dollars, with an added four thousand dollars for building needs. Provision was made in 1838⁹ by a two-thousand-dollar appropriation for the erection of workshops and the introduction of mechanical employment as a part of the work of the institution.¹⁰

¹ There were nine judicial circuits. The expense involved amounted to $675.

Education of the blind.—With the exception of two special acts to assist individuals, one afterward repealed, the state took no steps looking toward the education of the blind until 1835.¹ In this year the governor was requested to direct the county auditors to make a complete report on the number of blind persons in the state,² and in the following year³ a committee was appointed to study the question of the education of the blind in letters and mechanical arts and to report to the General Assembly the results of their findings with an estimate of the probable expense of establishing a public school for that purpose.

This committee made a careful study of the subject. They quote largely in their report⁴ from the address of Dr. S. G. Howe, director of the New England Institution for the Blind, which he had made to the trustees of that institution. In this address of Dr. Howe's there is given a synopsis of the development of the education of the blind in the different European nations and some description of the beginnings of such work in the New York and New England institutions.

In addition to the information so gained the committee addressed a list of specific questions to the directors of the New York, New England, and Pennsylvania institutions for the blind asking for definite information about expense, number of teachers needed, textbooks available, types of industry suitable to be taught in a school of this kind, and other questions of a similar nature. Provision was also made for Dr. Howe to visit Columbus during the session of the legislature to "deliver lectures and exhibit one or two of the pupils in such a manner as to prove their attainments."

The committee estimated the number of blind in the state as 500, basing the estimate on the United States census and the reports made by the county auditors. Of this number there were 60 under sixteen years of age whose names and residences were known.

The report closes with the following recommendation:

In order to commence a school it will be necessary to rent a suitable house, and furnish the books and apparatus for a class, and procure one teacher who is qualified to give instruction, and provide for the support of those children who are indigent. For this purpose it is supposed that, if the Legislature shall determine in favor of the measure, an appropriation of $1,500 will be necessary.— And if it shall be deemed expedient to purchase a site on which permanent buildings may hereafter be erected, a further sum of $1,000 may be needed. It is desirable also, that as early as practicable, musical instruments may be procured, and the necessary arrangements may be made, for teaching music, not only as a solace and a pleasure to the blind in their disconsolate condition as strangers to sight; but as a means of contributing to their own support in the school, and afterward also. And it is especially desirable, and indeed highly important, that a superintendent of work, together with implements and materials for some profitable manufactures, should be furnished; and thus every pupil, when discharged, may be able to make his own living.

In conclusion the Trustees . . . beg leave, most respectfully and most earnestly, to recommend to the General Assembly the immediate establishment of an Institution for the instruction of the Blind.¹

On the Fourth of July, in 1837, the first "school was opened with prayer, in the Presbyterian Church in the presence of the Teachers and scholars of the Sunday Schools connected with the different denominations in Columbus, who, to the number of 900, had assembled to celebrate the sixty-first anniversary of Independence. On this day the Teacher and five pupils were present. This number was increased to nine, at the middle of September, and still further to eleven in the month of November."²

The experience of the legislature with the deaf and dumb school had prepared it to accept the responsibility for the school for the blind in a larger way, and in 1837³ trustees were appointed, and a sum of fifteen thousand dollars was authorized for buildings and ten thousand dollars appropriated for the purpose of building materials and to pay the expense of beginning the school at once. In 1838⁴ fifteen thousand dollars was appropriated to complete the building, and the trustees were authorized to receive twelve students at state expense. A tuition and maintenance fee not to exceed one hundred and twenty dollars annually was fixed for other students. The trustees were authorized to procure all necessary material and implements for the purpose of instruction in useful arts and trades.

In 1843⁵ the limitation as to the number of students received at state expense was removed, and it was left to the discretion of the trustees. The regulations on this subject appear to have been administered leniently, both in the case of the school for the blind and in that for the deaf and dumb, as frequent resolutions appear allowing exceptions in special cases.

In 1845¹ the legislature made another appeal to Congress for a land grant to assist in the education of the blind and the deaf and dumb, asking that such a grant be made in all the states where it had not been done; but the grant was not made, and the state was forced to assume full responsibility for both institutions.

THE EDUCATION OF DEPENDENTS

The first appropriation authorized from the state treasury of Ohio for educational purposes of any kind is found in the case of an Indian orphan girl whose mother had been shot by a citizen without provocation. In 1820² three hundred and fifty dollars was voted to pay for her support and education for seven years. This was repealed the following year,³ but in 1823⁴ twenty-five dollars annually was definitely appropriated for that purpose until she should reach the age of twelve years. This is the only time the state made any financial provision for the education of dependent children prior to 1850. In 1806⁵ in an act concerning apprentices and servants it was directed that in all indentures for binding or putting out a child as servant or apprentice there should be a clause that every master or mistress should at least cause such child "to be taught and instructed to read and write." In 1824⁶ this was extended to embrace as much arithmetic as would include the single rule of three, and the further provision that at the expiration of the term of service each minor child was to receive a new Bible and two suits of wearing apparel.

This embraces all the state provisions on the subject from 1803 to 1850, and it is interesting to note that the two laws last cited are the only laws passed during the period that in any way touch upon compulsory education, and these carry no penalties for failure to obey.

Orphan asylums and schools for poor children.—Orphan asylums were incorporated in Cincinnati in 1833,¹ in Cleveland in 1837,² in Columbus in 1838,³ and in Dayton in 1844.⁴ These four institutions were all incorporated by women, and were to be under the management of women, as indicated in the acts of incorporation. A second asylum was incorporated by a Catholic society in Cincinnati in 1843,⁵ and in 1845⁶ an asylum for colored children was incorporated in the same city. The Stark County Orphans' Institute appeared in 1837,⁷ but its charter was revoked three years later because it had embarked in the banking business.⁸ There were also three endowed schools incorporated for the benefit of poor children, one in Cincinnati in 1827,⁹ one in Zanesville in 1834,¹⁰ and one in Kendal in 1826.¹¹ Their purpose, however, was to afford instruction free to children whose parents were unable to pay for it, not primarily to care for the wholly dependent. These three schools were the Woodward Free Grammar School, the M'Intire Poor School, and the Charity School of Kendal.

THE EDUCATION OF DELINQUENTS

Education of delinquents.—No state provision was made for the education of delinquents prior to 1850, and but little was done through private or municipal effort. In 1843¹² an act was passed for the regulation of county jails, which directed that each prisoner should be supplied with a Bible, and that the sheriff should keep a record of the means furnished for literary, moral, and religious instruction. In 1845¹³ the directors of the penitentiary were authorized to employ some suitable person as a religious and moral instructor, and in the same year the city of Cincinnati was authorized to erect a house of correction.¹⁴

These three laws, one of them local in application, comprise the entire activity of the state for the moral and intellectual advance of delinquents prior to 1850.

CHAPTER VI

THE TRAINING OF TEACHERS

In the preparation of teachers, as in other phases of educational activity, Ohio depended upon the sentiment and effort of individuals and communities, and did nothing through state aid or direction other than to legalize through incorporation the concerted efforts of groups of teachers or charter institutions established by private initiative. As a result of the educational awakening that accompanied the passage of the general school law of 1838, and the appointment of a state superintendent, some attention was given by the legislature to the state's responsibility, and the state superintendent was asked in the same year¹ to report to the next General Assembly "first, upon the expediency of establishing a state university or universities for the education of teachers and other students; second, if he shall deem it expedient to establish such university or universities then upon the subject of the proper system therefor, and the proper location thereof; third, also upon the proper mode of supporting same, the probable expense thereof to the state, and such other views and information in relation to the subject generally as he may deem it proper to communicate."

Mr. Lewis in his report strongly urged the necessity for the need of schools to train those expecting to teach,² but no action was taken by the General Assembly to found such an institution.

It was through the activity of voluntary associations of teachers and friends of education that the first efforts were made to raise the standard of the teaching profession. As early as 1829³ such an association had been meeting regularly in Cincinnati for the discussion of educational problems, and at a general convention to which friends of education throughout the Mississippi Valley were invited an association was formed called the Western College of Teachers. As one result of this association the first educational journal in the Northwest, The Academic Pioneer, was established and continued for some ten years.

² Ohio Documents, 37th G.A., Part 2, Doc. 72.

³ Taylor, A Manual of the Ohio School System, p. 333.

The original association was incorporated by legislative action February 13, 1832,¹ under the name of the Western Academic Institute and Board of Education, and its purpose was declared to be the promotion of "harmony, co-operation and efficiency in the diffusion of elementary knowledge, and discussing such subjects as may be considered conducive to the advantage of education generally." This association was intended to exercise an influence through the Mississippi Valley, and of its four vice-presidents one was from Harrodsburg, Kentucky, and another from Rising Sun, Iowa.

Two years later, through the leadership of many of the same men, an act was passed to incorporate² "The Teachers' Institute." The preamble and first section are of interest and show an advanced educational sentiment on the part of the incorporators and a definite attempt to meet the needs for better trained teachers, and illustrate the general legislative willingness to legalize educational effort through incorporation.

Whereas it has been reported to the General Assembly that a literary institution devoted to the instruction of professional teachers is much wanted within this state, and would be of much public utility. Therefore, be it enacted, etc., that there shall be established and instituted in the name hereinafter directed, a college for the instruction of candidates for professional school teachers, and for the purpose of qualifying such teachers in the best manner to instruct and govern schools, and other seminaries of learning, and to advance the intellectual and moral cultivation of youth.

Among the incorporators were many warm friends of the public schools. The names of Lyman Beecher, John P. Foote, Nathan Guilford—through whose efforts the school law of 1825 took final form—Robert Picket, David L. Talbott, and others appear. The school for teachers that these men had in mind did not materialize, but there were continued until 1845 regular conventions of teachers and friends of education, and their discussions and influence were instrumental in awakening educational sentiment throughout the state.³

³ Taylor, A Manual of the Ohio School System, p. 334.

In 1832¹ the Marietta Collegiate Institute and Western Teachers' Seminary, which three years later became Marietta College, was incorporated. The original purpose was declared to be "the instruction of youth in the various branches of useful knowledge, and especially the education of teachers for common schools."

Other incorporations were the Wayne County Ohio Teachers' Association in 1833,² the Teachers' Institute at Fairmount,³ the Meigs County High School and Teachers' Institute,⁴ and the American Lyceum of Education in Cincinnati.⁵

This last institution planned to establish a common school "for the purpose of furnishing a model school, and one in which experiments might be made as to the best modes and means of instruction, with a view to advancing the interests of common school education throughout the state."

In 1847⁶ the state passed a permissive act allowing teachers in eleven counties of the state to incorporate teachers' institutes. Ten of these counties were located in the Western Reserve. This act allowed the county commissioners in the counties named to use a portion of the money derived from the surplus revenue fund for the support of the institutes so organized. The counties had been held responsible by the act distributing the surplus revenue⁷ for the payment of 5 per cent annually for the use of common schools. Any amount derived over this the counties had been allowed to devote to the support of common schools, the promotion of internal improvements, or the building of academies. They were now allowed in the eleven counties named to include teachers' institutes among the objects to which aid from this extra fund might be extended. The money was to be used under the direction of the school examiners of the county in the employment of instructors and lecturers, and in the purchase of a common school library for the use of the association.

This act was made general for the state in 1848⁸ by the same act that permitted counties to provide for county superintendents if they wished to do so. The following year, 1849,¹ the county commissioners were allowed to appropriate from other sources whatever sum was needed to bring the total annual amount for this purpose up to one hundred dollars, but before doing so the teachers petitioning for such an institute were required to present evidence to the commissioners that they had already raised one-half of the total amount needed for the support of the institute, and the petition had to have the signature of forty regular teachers within the county, and also of the county board of examiners.

The Farmington Normal School in Trumbull County on the Western Reserve was incorporated in 1849² through the efforts of the citizens of Farmington, who gave a site and raised by voluntary subscription $2,575.00 for its support. A stock company was formed with shares selling at twenty-five dollars each. "One great object" of the school was declared to be "a thorough education of common or elementary school teachers, of both sexes, and to secure a course of intellectual and moral discipline for the youth of the country."

Nothing else appears in the legislation of the state prior to 1850 that has any reference to the training of teachers. Many of the academies assisted in supplying the deficiency and special courses were often organized in them for training teachers. The state, however, had no direct contact with this work. Governor Bartley voiced a feeling that was held by many friends of education that the state ought to take an active part in training teachers when he said in his message of December 3, 1844:³

The subject of normal schools or seminaries for the education of teachers is attracting much attention in several of the states of the Union, and in other countries, and by the pre-eminent advantages afforded by this means for advancing the cause of education, it commends itself to your favorable consideration. Departments for the education of professional teachers in Ohio and Miami Universities could be established under the authority of the state, and by a part of the means derived from the large endowments which these institutions have received from the government.⁴

³ Taylor, A Manual of the Ohio School System, p. 180.

⁴ The plan proposed by Governor Bartley was the one finally followed by the state fifty-seven years later in establishing normal departments in these two schools.

CHAPTER VII

SUPPLEMENTARY EDUCATIONAL AGENCIES

LIBRARIES

The first recognition of libraries in the laws of the state is found in the charter of the Dayton Library Society, February 21, 1805.¹ There is plenty of evidence, however, that the early settlers established libraries before this, but had not sought the legal sanction of a state charter. Venable² says that the first library in the territory northwest of the Ohio was at Belpre, near Marietta. This was organized in 1796, and was first known as the Putnam Family Library, later as the Belpre, or Belpre Farmers' Library. This library was owned by a joint stock company, the common method of procedure in the formation of later libraries and library companies.

Another of these early ventures, much better known than the preceding, was the so-called 'Coon-skin Library. This was located at Ames, Washington County, also near Marietta. The reason for the name popularly given to it and the circumstances of its beginning are thus told by one of the founders:

At a public meeting of the inhabitants of Ames, called to devise means to improve our roads, and to consult about making one to connect the settlement at Sunday creek with that on Federal creek, held in the autumn of 1802, the intellectual wants of the neighborhood became the subject of the conversation. It was suggested that a library would supply what was needed, but the settlers had no money, and with few exceptions were in debt for their lands. Mr. Josiah True, of Sunday creek settlement, proposed to obtain the means by catching 'coons, and sending their skins to Boston by Samuel Brown, Esq., who expected to go east in a wagon the next summer. Esquire Brown was present and assented to this proposition. Our young men were active hunters; the 'coon skins and other furs were furnished and sent to market, and the books were bought. The Rev. Thaddeus Harris and the Rev. Dr. Manasseh Cutler selected for us about fifty volumes of choice books, and to these additions were made from time to time. As the settlement increased and children grew up, readers were multiplied, and all could have access to the library.³

² Venable, Beginnings of Literary Culture in the Ohio Valley, Historical and Biographical Sketches, p. 135.

³ Cutler, Life and Times of Ephraim Cutler, p. 50.

These early attempts to furnish opportunity for community study and improvement were followed by an increasing number of similar organizations during the first four decades of the nineteenth century.

Atwater, writing in 1838,¹ said that most of the towns in Ohio had reading-rooms where a traveler could read all the principal newspapers and periodicals, and that libraries were increasing in number as well as size. The record of incorporations in the session laws bears witness to the probable truth of his statement. One hundred and ninety-two library societies had been incorporated by 1850. The record of incorporation in the preceding decades is as follows:

The State Library at Columbus received regular appropriations from 1824² on. In 1846³ district school libraries were authorized, but their support was left wholly to the initiative of the district. The law authorized the district to raise by taxes a sum not to exceed thirty dollars for the first year, and not more than ten dollars for each succeeding year. The decision was left to a meeting of the taxpayers of the district, called for the purpose of voting on the question.

LYCEUMS, INSTITUTES, ATHENAEUMS, AND LITERARY SOCIETIES

In addition to the library societies, there were frequent incorporations of lyceums, athenaeums, institutes, and literary societies, the total number of such incorporations being 64. These developed rapidly after 1830, prior to that time only three institutions of this type being incorporated. The record of their incorporation is as follows:

These latter institutions seem designed to afford meeting-places for their members for discussion and opportunity for reading and study. The use of their funds is usually limited to the purchase of books, maps, charts, pamphlets, and newspapers. Among them were eight mechanics' institutes, seven of these incorporated after 1831. The first one of the latter was the Ohio Mechanics' Institute of Cincinnati in 1829,¹ and its purpose was declared to be for "advancing the best interests of the Mechanics, Manufacturers and Artizans by the more general diffusion of useful knowledge in these important classes in the community."

COLLEGE SOCIETIES

The first college literary society incorporated was the Erodelphian Society of Miami University in 1831,² followed in the same year by the Philomathesian Society of Kenyon College.³

By 1850 twenty-three college and university societies were thus given sanction. Four of the number were incorporated under Greek-letter names.

MISCELLANEOUS

In addition to the various types of educational endeavor represented in the preceding paragraphs there were also incorporated the following institutions, whose names indicate a wide range of literary and artistic interest supplementary to the regular educational agencies: the Historical Society of Ohio, 1822;⁴ the Cincinnati Academy of Fine Arts, 1828;⁵ the Lancaster Harmonic Society, 1830;⁶ the Historical and Philosophical Society of Ohio, 1831;⁷ the Eclectic Academy of Music in Cincinnati, 1835;⁸ the

CHAPTER VIII

CONCLUSION

The two essential features of Ohio's educational policy as illustrated by the legislation passed from 1803 to 1850 are, first, the lack of any efficient central control of local educational activities, and, second, the permissive character of a large part of the legislation passed, and the lack of any compulsory features.

The large amount of educational legislation enacted shows that there was no lack of educational interest in the state, either in the public at large or in the people's representatives in the General Assembly. There was a widespread belief in universal education and a desire for it. While there was, as elsewhere, much opposition to taxation and to the idea of distributive responsibility for free schools, the general educational sentiment was good. The laws themselves show in many cases excellent educational possibilities. The weakness of the legislation was due to the fact that the theory followed seemed to be that the function of educational legislation was to establish general rules of organization and control in accord with which the communities might regulate their own educational activities and have legal sanction for them, but that it was not the function of the state to develop any legal machinery that would definitely bring about educational results.

The words of Samuel Lewis are so significant in this connection that they are quoted once more. Speaking of the law of 1838, far the best educational legislation of the entire period, he said:

It gives to the people the power to do their own business whether in townships or districts as the majority may think best. The widest possible latitude is given for popular action: the most that the law does is to prescribe certain general rules within which the people can act under the sanction of the law, and it gives to such popular action the aid of law to effect its purpose.¹

This expresses as well as it can be done the state theory that seems to underlie all the educational legislation prior to 1850.

¹ Third Annual Report of the Superintendent of the Common Schools, made to the Thirty-eighth General Assembly of the State of Ohio, p. 4.

One result of this type of legislation was great freedom in educational experimentation, with legislative sanction when that was asked for. In communities where the general school sentiment was high, as in Cincinnati, Cleveland, Akron, and some other towns and cities, this resulted in an excellent type of school system, and through this experimentation a legalized model was given to other communities throughout the state. The results were excellent for those communities which chose to follow the example set, and there were many that did so. On the other hand, there were no penalties in any of the legislation prior to 1850 to compel even towns and cities to organize schools other than those of the district type, and the only compulsion to organize schools of any kind was the loss of the community's share of the school tax if it did not do so.

Ohio early took an advanced position on the right and desirability of taxing all property in the state for school purposes. This principle appeared in 1825, when the commissioners of each county were directed to levy a half-mill for school support, and it remained in all subsequent laws in some form. With this principle established, the state did not concern itself further to compel either the taxation or the establishment of schools. These were matters to be decided by smaller local areas. The general idea seemed to be that self-interest and a desire to use the share of money to which each district was entitled would be sufficient incentive for the establishment of public schools in the districts throughout the state. The results of the next fifteen years show that this belief was in large part justified. Mr. Lewis estimated the number of district schools taught in Ohio in the year 1839¹ at 13,049, and he based this estimate on actual reports from 5,442 districts in which 7,295 schools were taught. The state, however, took no responsibility for seeing that the children of the district attended the school so established, and but a minor responsibility for the activities that were carried on in it.

This lack of compelling power and lack of efficient administrative officers made the system a loose and ineffective one, under which the various communities continued largely to do that which was right in their own eyes.

The great educational blunder of Ohio was in the abolition of the office of state superintendent in 1840. Although the office as created in 1837 did not carry with it the possibility of exercising any large legal powers, and was confined largely to the gathering of school statistics and the dissemination throughout the state of educational information concerning the laws in force and other matters of educational interest, it did centralize the educational interest of the state in one office, and had in it great possibilities of usefulness. The law of 1838, with the state superintendent at the head of the system, contained much of educational promise. It is not too much to say that if Mr. Lewis or a leader of equal ability could have continued the work begun so ably by him from 1837 to 1840, the educational development of Ohio might have paralleled that in Massachusetts under the guidance of Horace Mann. The explanation of its failure to do so must be found in the fact that, in spite of much educational interest, the people as a whole were not ready for such leadership. Whatever the causes may have been, the result was to leave Ohio educationally a generation behind the position she might have occupied had she lived up to the full promise of the law of 1838.

Nowhere is there a better illustration of the need of a centralized administrative office capable of giving to the legislature advice founded upon knowledge of the facts, and of administering the policies adopted uniformly throughout the state, than in the legislation concerning Ohio school lands. Educational interest, state economic interests—such as the question of internal improvements—local interests, and, too often, individual interests were all presented to the legislature, which acted in many cases upon a one-sided presentation of the facts. The result was a mass of confused facts and conflicting legislation that as it multiplied left the legislators themselves in ignorance as to the exact law that applied in particular cases. Opportunities for carelessness and downright dishonesty in the local handling of the funds and the selling and leasing of the lands were afforded, and, as the records show, not all local officials were either careful or honest. Aside from carelessness and occasional dishonesty, the conflict between the immediate interest of a neighbor and the more distant interest of the schools, that often confronted the local appraisers of lands, must have been frequently disastrous for the schools. John Brough, the auditor of state, said in 1840 that “anyone who would seek the records and gather the melancholy facts they contained would be convinced of the waste that had taken place.”

The state had no clearly defined state-wide policy applicable in all instances and under all circumstances, and it lacked efficient machinery of government to administer carefully the policies that were initiated.

It is not probable that dishonesty or wilful carelessness was the cause of the legislation that made great loss possible, but rather ignorance of conditions and a hand-to-mouth expediency to meet present needs. This could have been largely avoided through the establishment of a central office, interested primarily in preserving for the educational interests of the state the first state-wide grant made by the general government for the use of schools.

There is little to be said in summarizing the state's attitude toward secondary and higher education. Ohio lacked in the beginning, and failed to develop during the period, any state educational policy that embraced elementary, secondary, and higher education. Her interest in public education was an interest in public elementary education only, not in secondary or higher institutions. One explanation for this is doubtless found in the abundance of local secondary and higher institutions established by private initiative, and a second in the fact that the three townships granted by the government for higher education were located in the Ohio Company's Purchase and in the Symmes Purchase, and that the resulting institutions were regarded as largely local and only quasi-state in nature. With a lack of clearly recognized state institutions of college or university rank, there was no pressure from above for a system of preparatory schools under state control.

Secondary education was still generally regarded as a privilege to be obtained by those who could afford to pay for it, not as a recognized part of a free state system. Private secondary schools had been established in abundance. It was not surprising that the development of a state system of secondary schools came as a part of the general high-school movement that began to take on vigorous growth about 1850.

The characteristic features of Ohio's educational legislation during her first half-century of statehood left a strong impression upon the state's educational policy for the next fifty years. The lack of any efficient centralized control, the absence of compulsory local supervision of any kind, an abundance of excellent permissive laws, which legalized advanced educational procedure without compelling it, the passing of laws general in form but local in application, lack of any state agency for training teachers for her schools—these continued throughout the next half-century, from 1850 to 1900, as marked traits of the state's educational procedure.

It is only in very recent years that Ohio has freed herself from some of the most undesirable features of her early legislative inheritance and has adopted a modern, progressive, centralized state system of education, with state-wide supervision, that places her on a parity with her most advanced sister-states.

No. 2. The History of Educational Legislation in Ohio from 1803 to 1850. By EDWARD ALANSON MILLER, Ph.D. Pp. 245. Price $2.00, postpaid.

No. 3. Development of High-School Curricula in the North Central States. By JOHN ELBERT STOUT, Ph.D., Professor of Education, Cornell College, Iowa. (In press.)

This study will be an important aid in formulating new and modifying old courses of study and in reorganizing the subject-matter of the high-school curriculum during the period of reconstruction. It covers the development of courses and subject-matter in high schools in the North Central states from 1860 to the present time. The main topics discussed are curricula organization, changes in subject-matter for each high-school subject, and developments in each subject.

No. 4. A History of Educational Legislation in Mississippi from 1798 to 1860. By William H. Weathersby, Professor of Education, Mississippi College, Clinton, Mississippi. (In press.)

The history of the educational legislation of Mississippi is of peculiar interest for several reasons. Being one of the states of the New South, this legislation was influenced by two important factors, absent in the states of the Old South: first, the original settlers came principally from the back-country regions of the South Atlantic states,—and secondly, they entered an environment which approached that of the New West, the region west of the Alleghanies. Both of these factors led to the development of a democratic, decentralized school system, designed to meet the special needs or demands of individual counties and even smaller units. As a result, we may observe the consequences of local self-government in education at the expense of an efficient centralized state system, based on general laws operative over the entire state.
